THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 52.

This was twenty-two years after the grant of the exclusive privilege to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. I beg leave (for I consider it important) to call the attention of the Senate to the charter of this company for the purpose of showing what they had a right to do. I refer to the sixth section of the act of incorporation. I will not read the whole of it:

"That the president and directors of the said company be, and they hereby are, authorized and invested with all the rights and powers necessary and expedient to survey, lay out, and construct, a railroad from some suitable point on the Raritan bay, eastward of the village of Keyport, in the county of Monmouth, to the village of Tom's River, in the county of Ocean; and thence, through the counties of Ocean and Burlington, to May's Landing, in the county of Atlantic; thence, through the counties of Atlantic and Cape May, to Cape Island, on the Atlantic ocean;"

the extreme southern point of our State; and the general line was to be along the coast, the object being to establish a coast road. That was the line and the general course and direction of the road as pointed out by the charter. The tenth section says what they may do:

"That the president and directors of the said corporation shall have power to have constructed, or to purchase with the funds of the corporation, and to place on the said railroad, all machinery, engines, cars, wagons, carriages, or vehicles, for the transportation of persons or property, and also suitable and safe boats at the several terminating points of the said road; and they are hereby authorized to demand and receive such sum or sums of money for the transportation of persons and property thereon, as they, from time to time, shall think reasonable and proper."

They were authorized to construct a road from Raritan bay, at a point east of the village of Keyport, which was in the neighborhood, nearer the Atlantic ocean than the terminus of the Camden and Amboy road, and they were to run the general course of their road along the coast through the villages of Tom's River and May's Landing down to Cape May; and they were to carry passengers and freight along the line of that road over and upon it. They accepted this charter twenty-two years after the grant of the exclusive privilege to the Camden and Amboy railroad, with full knowledge of it; and in thus accepting it, with full knowledge of the laws of the State, and with a full understanding of the effect of them, they must be considered, in law and in common sense, to be bound by the acceptance of their charter and their contract with the State under such circumstances.

But, sir, I may mention another fact. In the year 1854, the same year that this company was chartered, the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, at the very same time that it granted this charter, for the purpose of defining and declaring their intention and limiting this exclusive privilege to the Camden and Amboy Company, and as it would seem to have been a part of the understanding at the time that they granted to the Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad their charter, by an act declared that they reaffirmed this exclusive grant to the Camden and Amboy Company, declaring it to be their intent to protect it until the year 1869, and then to end it.

In view of this recital of legislative history, and in view of these facts, in view of the fact that this company thus accepted their charter twenty-two years after that exclusive grant, with full knowledge of it, from the same Legislature which then reaffirmed this exclusive grant for the period of some fourteen years longer, I ask, in law and in morals, are they not bound, at least so far as they are concerned, by the action of the Legislature of their own State? Can the Congress of the United States say that a company who have thus accepted a charter under such circumstances can cut loose, or be allowed to cut loose, from all the conditions, restrictions, and limitations imposed upon them by their charter, and to run a line in direct competition with that road which they knew and understood had this exclusive privilege for a certain period of time? This company accepted its charter subject to these conditions and limitations imposed upon it by the laws of New Jersey, and which were involved in its charter, and in a matter solely within the jurisdiction of the State; and I claim it is as much bound by that contract as if it had been spread upon the very act of incorporation by which their powers were created; and they can no more violate it with impunity than they can violate a letter found within their chartered privilege itself.

I have one other document to refer to for the purpose of a more complete understanding of this matter; and it is a little map of my own State. I do not know that anybody will feel a sufficient degree of interest to look at it, but it will show the nature and history of this controversy perhaps more clearly than it can be shown by any words of mine. The Camden and Amboy Company have a charter to start their road from Raritan bay—they have started it from Perth Amboy—and to run it to Camden, opposite Philadelphia. This dark line upon the map [exhibiting it to the Senate] shows the line of that road, which is pretty generally direct, running northeast and southwest. That was chartered in 1830. In 1852 the Camden and Atlantic road, to which I have referred, was chartered, to start opposite Camden, in the State of New Jersey, and to run southeast to a point on the coast, with the privilege of building the little roads to which I have referred, six miles north to Batsto, and another six miles south to May's Landing. In 1854 the Raritan and Delaware Bay-railroad was chartered, and that was authorized to commence at a point east of Keyport, and they have commenced at Port Monmouth, and to run down along the coast through the village of Tom's River to May's Landing, continuing along the coast to Cape May; and by a supplement to their charter, passed in 1855, they were authorized to connect with any other road in Maryland or Virginia which might be incorporated for the purpose of carrying on a line of travel along the whole line of our Atlantic coast. Subsequently, within two or three years, as appears by testimony to which I can refer, the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company have built, or allowed to be built, as it is alleged, by the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company, this lateral road on the north side of their track, commencing at a point eighteen miles east of Philadelphia and running in a northeasterly direction to a place called Atsion. By a supplement to the charter of the Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad in 1855, they were authorized to deflect their line so as to leave Tom's River to the east, but they were not to depart from the general line of their road. Under these circumstances, having secured that supplement to their charter, and having obtained the consent of the Camden and Atlantic railroad to construct a part of this Batsto road to a point at Atsion, they themselves have deflected their road, and instead of coming down to May's Landing they have built it far to the west, some eight or ten miles to Atsion, and have commenced and are now running, or were running, passengers and freight along the line of that road to Atsion, then on the Camden and Atlantic railroad, and so to Philadelphia, abandoning, or not prosecuting, the route of road which they were chartered to use, and which was the sole and only design, as I shall show, in obtaining their charter, if the evidence which has been taken before one of the courts of New Jersey is to be relied upon.

Thus the matter stood until about two years ago. The Camden and Amboy road had been operating for a period of thirty years. It was found about two years ago that by means of these confederated companies passengers were being carried from New York to Philadelphia on the route of that "elbow" road, consisting of three different roads. A bill was filed in our court of chancery setting up these facts. I shall not dwell upon it further than to give the Senate an idea of the facts. It was stated that the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company, in connection with the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company, were carrying passengers and freight between New York and Philadelphia, and had deflected the line of their road contrary to law, and an injunction was prayed for. The Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company came in by their president and their officers and answered: I will quote from the opinion of the Chancellor some of the things they admitted:

"They admit that the road as constructed diverges about ten miles from the direct route to May's Landing, but say that the location by way of Atsion, as at present located, is the most feasible, expedient, and proper location for the railroad contemplated in the act of incorporation, and that the direct route from Squankum to May's Landing was surveyed by direction of the company and found to be impracticable, and that the terminus of the Batsto branch (which forms the connecting link between the two roads) at Jackson is the most convenient and proper point on the Camden and Atlantic road from which to make a branch solely for a local road. They deny that any agreement has been made or is intended to be made for the transportation of freight or passengers between the cities of New York and Philadelphia. They admit that they and the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company have in view the construction and perfecting, by means of their respective railroads and a convenient connection between them, of a continuous and convenient line of railway communication across New Jersey from the city of Camden to Port Monmouth, but they deny that they or any of them have in view the continuation of said line, at either end thereof, by steamboat transportation to the cities of New York and Philadelphia for the purpose of using the same for the transportation of passengers or merchandise in a manner which will violate any contract between the State and the complainants, or any provisions of the acts of the Legislature referred to in the complainants' bill. They also deny that any contract or arrangement made by them is calculated or intended to form a continuous line of railway communication between the said cities to compete in business with the business of the complainants, contrary to their vested rights. They admit that it is possible, if not prohibited by law, that a line of communication by railroad and steamboat between the cities of New York and Philadelphia might be opened, but they say that their railroad is not a public highway and cannot so be used without their concurrence and consent, and as they have made no arrangement whatsoever so to use the same, and do not intend any unlawful use of their road, such use if unlawful cannot be made, and if attempted can be restrained by the courts. They also deny that they intend in any way to violate the chartered rights of the complainants, or that they intend during their existence to violate any of the alleged exclusive privileges of the complainants."

Upon the denial of all the equities contained in the bill, the Chancellor refused to grant the injunction. He said that upon this denial, complete and full, no injury had been done, or was done, to the Camden and Amboy Company; and, with respect to the change of their road, that was a matter the Camden and Amboy Company had nothing to do with; it was a matter for the Attorney General of the State to see to, in case they were not using or exercising their privileges rightly and correctly in respect to location.

Very soon afterward it was found that this Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company was actually transporting passengers and freight across these connecting roads, between New York and Philadelphia, and a supplemental bill was filed and testimony taken to establish the fact. The cause was heard before the Chancellor. The fact was not denied or disputed; and I will read a portion of the opinion of the Chancellor to show what decision he made on the question. The bill was filed by the Delaware and Raritan Canal and Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation Companies against the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company, the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company, and others. The Chancellor says:

"The complainants' rights are clear and unquestioned. They have been in the actual enjoyment of their franchise for more than thirty years. The defendants, by using or permitting their roads to be used for the establishment of a through route for the transportation of freight and passengers between the cities of New York and Philadelphia have exceeded the powers conferred upon them, and interfered with the rights and the property of the complainants. There is nothing in the charters of the defendant corporations, or of either of them, which expressly or by implication confers the power of establishing such route or the franchise of taking tolls thereon. The Legislature cannot be presumed to have intended or contemplated any grant inconsistent with the manifest design of the charters of the defendants."

And the Chancellor enjoined this company in the use of these roads for the purpose of transporting freight and passengers between New York and Philadelphia, manifestly contrary to the object and intent of their charter, and to the very express declaration made by themselves under oath within a year before that they had no such intention whatever.

Now I appeal to this Senate, composed as it is in part of lawyers, whether this opinion is wrong. If it is, why not remove the case to the Supreme Court of the United States for the purpose of judicial investigation and decision? Why appeal to Congress to override the laws and decisions of my State, even if she be in the condition referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts? This Senate is composed of men who have too high a regard for their own duties to disregard well-known and well-established principles of law and justice, even to strike at a State which has been characterized as New Jersey has been on this floor. The courts will have to settle this question at last. Pass this bill, and it will be a subject-matter for judicial investigation. Why not then suffer the matter to be determined and investigated upon the decree of the Chancellor of the State of New Jersey in the case now made up and which has been before him and upon which he has rendered a decision?

Again, why seek to change the character of this bill from what it was at the time of its introduction, a special bill against my State, and my State alone, and make it general, expansive, reaching to all the States of this Union? Surely it serves only to make the matter worse. Being more universal, it affects all the States, and, I submit, in many ways not intended by Senators. I show you how it will affect my State. This bill which has passed the House will affect it as injuriously and prejudicially as the bill first introduced into the House.

I have no interest in either of these roads. I have not a dollar of their stock, and never had any, and do not suppose that I shall ever be able to own any of it. But, sir, I have an interest in the honor and dignity of the State of New Jersey, and I call upon Senators as the representatives of sister States to stand by and protect one of the original States of this Union, one of the old thirteen, in her rights, and I ask nothing more.

Senators, how will this question affect your own States? How will it affect the State of Massachusetts in reference to the railroad from Boston to Lowell, mentioned in the case that has been decided and reported in 2 Gray's Massachusetts Reports, and which has been referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. Hale?] How will it affect other roads? Although exclusive privileges conferred upon railroad companies are not very common, there are quite a number to be found in the States of this Union outside even of the State of New Jersey and the State of Massachusetts. Pass this bill, and you will confer upon State corporations powers not conferred upon them by their charters; powers they never asked for; powers they contracted never to use; powers which it has been decided by the courts they are not entitled to, and which are contrary to law; powers to carry passengers and freight and do business between points and places contrary to their charters and restricted by their contracts entered into with the States themselves.

But it is said by the Senator from Massachusetts and by others—the newspapers teem with it—that the people of New Jersey and the people of this country are subject to a monopoly. So far as the State of New Jersey is concerned, I have to say this: if this be a monopoly from which the people of that State suffer, it is self-imposed.

"Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow."

If the allegation have any foundation in truth and justice, shall we to escape domestic vassalage submit to foreign domination? Do we suffer? If we do, it is the consequence of our own act. But, sir, I am not so well assured that all these declarations of usurpations and vassalage and suffering which have been so eloquently referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts are true, or founded in just grounds of complaint. This subject of monopoly is a favorite theme of declamation. It is an ancient theme in my own State. As long back as the year 1702 there were but three wagon roads across the State of New Jersey, and Queen Anne, if I recollect the history aright, chartered a wagon road from Perth Amboy, the very point where this railroad starts, to Burlington, seventeen miles above Camden, on the Delaware river; and although it took two weeks to perform the passage under that royal grant and privilege, it raised a hue and cry in my State on the ground that it was an odious monopoly! The cry has continued from that time down to the present hour.

But it is said the citizens of other States are subject to this monopoly. It is said that they are subject to a transit duty, that they are subject to a tribute; and the Senator from Massachusetts referred us to, and read a passage from, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, in which he likened my State to the Valley of Humiliation, and the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, and its steam engine, from whose belly fire and smoke proceeds, as Apollyon himself, or the personification of him. The Senator forgot to tell us who Christian was. As he complained so bitterly of this tribute, perhaps he meant to infer that he was the subject of the king of that country, and that he was Christian escaping from this city of Destruction with his face set Zionward. If so, he lacks the great characteristic of Christian, because I found no charity in what he said.

But what is this matter of tribute or transit duty? It is said that in the charter of the Camden and Amboy Company they have the right to charge ten cents on persons passing across the State, and fifteen cents per ton for merchandise. It is said, in other words, that every man who crosses the State of New Jersey on that railroad is taxed ten cents, and that every man who sends merchandise over it as freight is taxed fifteen cents per ton. I do not so understand it. I know there has been a great outcry on this subject for years in my own State and out of it; but what is it? It is nothing more nor less than a tax upon the business of the road instead of a tax upon its capital. The Legislature of New Jersey, in chartering this company, instead of saying that there should be paid so much upon the capital stock into the State treasury year after year, said there should be an account kept of the through travel upon the road and the through merchandise carried over the road, and that there should be paid in, upon a return made to the State treasury, ten cents for every passenger thus transported; and I think there is wisdom in the provision. When this charter was granted some thirty-five years ago, in the infancy of the railroad system, it was not known what amount of capital would be required to construct these works of public improvement; it was a matter of uncertainty; but it could be made a matter of perfect certainty as to how much money should be paid by fixing a toll or rate upon the business of the road; and thus it becomes a toll in the nature of an income tax, instead of a toll or tax upon the amount of the capital stock of the road. How are the public prejudiced or damaged by this provision?

It is another feature of the charter of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company that the price of transportation of both passengers and freight is fixed. The price of transporting a passenger upon this railroad across the State cannot exceed three dollars under any circumstances. I do not see for my part that the public in passing over that road are thus subjected to tribute or to a transit duty that would justify the denunciation of the Senator from Massachusetts.

But it is said there is a discrimination made between the citizens of the State of New Jersey and the citizens of other States. Why, sir, there is no such discrimination. The transit duty, to use this term, is upon through passengers, whether they belong to the State of New Jersey or to the State of Ohio. An account is taken of every man who crosses the State from the Delaware river to Raritan bay, whether he be a Jerseyman, or a Pennsylvanian, or a New Yorker, which is to be returned by the agent of the company to the State treasurer; and the amount ascertained to be due on account of the number of passengers who have thus crossed is paid into the treasury at the end of the year. The citizens of other States are upon a par with the citizens of New Jersey in this particular. The way passengers are not to be taken into the account. If the Senator from Massachusetts should visit our State, (and I trust he may some time, and entertain a better opinion of our people,) and should pass from point to point in that State, there would be no account taken of his passage from point to point, and no duty or tribute levied upon him any more than there would be on the Senator from New Jersey passing from the town of his residence to the city of Philadelphia or the city of New York. There has been a great misunderstanding on this subject; and in the midst of a tirade such as has been heaped upon my State, I think, perhaps, the Senator will excuse me for having occupied so much time in endeavoring to state just what is the true history of the rights of this company, and their duties on this subject.

But suppose a different view should be entertained by gentlemen on this subject from the one I entertain. How is it with regard to this Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad? That seems to be the especial pet of the Senator from Massachusetts. You wish to authorize that company to go on and exercise these extraordinary powers in violation of the limitations and restrictions imposed upon it in its charter when granted. I beg leave to read the fourteenth section of the act incorporating the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company, to see what that says, and see how that company stands in relation to this same question:

"That from and after the completion of the said road, it shall be the duty of the treasurer of the said corporation, under oath or affirmation, to make quarterly returns of the number of passengers, and the number of tons of goods, wares, and merchandise, transported upon said road across the State, to the treasurer of this State, and thereupon to pay to the said treasurer of the State the same impost or transit duties which are now, or may be at any time hereafter, paid by the Camden and Amboy Railroad and Transportation Company, and no more."

Putting this Raritan and Delaware Bay Company upon precisely the same footing as the Camden and Amboy road, and making the law governing the Camden and Amboy Company the law to govern this road also. It is not a transit duty upon the passengers, not a tax per capita upon individuals, but only a mode of taxing the road through its business, instead of taxing the corporation, as many other railroads are, upon the amount of their capital stock invested in the road.

If we pass this bill as it has come from the House of Representatives it will establish a principle which will reach much further than many who have not reflected upon this subject suppose. I have shown you how it will affect my State. How will it affect yours, Senators? You may be stronger, you may be more able to resist it, but in the course of years it may be that the poisoned cup which you tender to our lips may be returned to your own.

It has been claimed also that this bill is necessary for the purpose of creating greater facilities for the transportation of goods and passengers across the State; that this rebellion requires the ready and sudden transmission of troops from the city of New York or from the North to this capital. I am aware of all such necessities; but I am not aware of any deficiency or difficulty arising from that source in times past. In fact, it has been shown by testimony that the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company have transported as many as eight thousand troops a day upon the lines of their road, and were able at all times to transport a great many more than they were called upon to transport by the Government, and that other troops and munitions of war have been transported upon the Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad, upon some arrangements which were satisfactory to the company and to the Government; so that there has been no difficulty about troops and munitions of war reaching this capital in consequence of the failure of railroad facilities in my State.

Why, sir, there are three railroads now crossing the State of New Jersey besides the Delaware and Raritan Bay road, all of which have transported troops and munitions of war to the Federal capital. There is this Camden and Amboy railroad; there is the New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company, which connects at Trenton with the Philadelphia and Trenton railroad; and there is the New Jersey Central railroad, which crosses the State to Easton, Pennsylvania, and connects with the Harrisburg railroad, upon which thousands of troops have been transported, and upon which the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. Sprague,] when he came on with his battery and with his munitions of war was transported to the capital during the period of its imminent peril. While there are these three railroads across the State of New Jersey, and while there are but two across the State of Pennsylvania toward the Federal capital, and while there is but one from the city of Baltimore to the city of Washington, the Senator from Massachusetts is loud in his complaint on account of the want of facilities and means for transportation across my State, and he has not a word to say, or a syllable to utter, in relation to the diminished means of transportation across these two other States lying nearer to the capital of the country and of the Union.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate much longer. I have already detained them longer than I anticipated when I rose to address the Senate. I understand that the peculiar right to pass this bill is claimed to be under the provision of the Constitution giving the power to Congress to regulate commerce among the States, to be found in the third clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. Then if this be true, if you pass this bill under that provision of the Constitution, these roads must be managed and controlled by the Government. It will be the duty of the Government to police them, to establish toll-houses upon them, to establish collection offices, to appoint collectors to receive this toll on freight and this transit duty upon the foreign commerce passing from one State into another, crossing the State of New Jersey. The one is a necessary consequence of the other; or, at all events, it authorizes it to be done, and thus directly interferes with the rights and privileges of the States which I claim to be reserved to them by the Constitution and not granted to the Federal Government. Shall Congress regulate and control the use of all these rights under this power of regulating commerce?

There is a piece of history upon this subject. In 1827, the then Secretary of the Treasury, just after the Erie canal was completed, required that canal boats passing through that canal should take out a license under the General Government for the purpose of transporting goods. The right was claimed by the Secretary of the Treasury under this same clause of the Constitution, that the General Government had a right to regulate commerce; but De Witt Clinton, then the Governor of the State of New York, in an able paper demolished that pretension, and the subject dropped, and has never been heard of from that day to this.

Now if the Senate please, I claim their indulgence while I refer to a few authorities upon the subject, which I think establishes the position that Congress has no right to interfere with the regulation, or to hold control over these roads or the internal improvements of the State. The first case to which I shall briefly refer is a case decided in the court of errors and appeals in my own State. I do not know that that will be entitled to much consideration at the hands of the Senator from Massachusetts; but if the authority and doctrine therein contained should be found to be supported by other authority, by the Supreme Court of the United States and the decisions of other State courts, perhaps it may have a little influence with the minds of other members of the Senate. The question arose in this case as to the power of a State to establish a toll-gate at the end of a ferry in the State of New Jersey, the other end of the ferry being in another State. It was insisted that this same clause of the Constitution prevented the State of New Jersey from doing that, because it interfered with this power of Congress to regulate commerce, that it imposed a tax or duty on commerce transmitted from one State to another. The case will be found in 4 Zabriskie's Reports, page 718. On page 729 the court say:

"That the State may regulate the tolls and fares on turnpikes and railroads and ferries wholly within its jurisdiction counsel have not gone so far as to deny. But such regulations will in many cases affect the commerce among the several States as much as the regulation of tolls at a ferry directly between two States. A large part of the commerce between Philadelphia and New York passes by means of the roads and canals through New Jersey, which latter State has always regulated the tolls without question. If the States separately or jointly cannot regulate a ferry between two of them, neither can they authorize the building of a bridge or prescribe the tolls for passing it. These and the like powers have been exercised by most of the States of the Union without doubt or hesitation, from the adoption of the Constitution to the present day, and are, in my opinion, in no wise repugnant to the provisions of that instrument."

The court prior to giving their decision examined the case of Smith vs. Turner, reported in 7 Howard, 393, in which Justice McLean, who was a strenuous advocate of the doctrine that the power of Congress to regulate commerce excludes the power of the States to legislate on the subject, says:

"A State cannot regulate commerce, but it may do many things which more or less affect it. It may tax a ship or other vessel used in commerce the same as other property owned by its citizens. A State may tax the stages in which the mail is transported, but this does not regulate the conveyance of the mail any more than taxing a ship regulates commerce. An inquiry is made whether Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, can impose a tax for the use of canals, railroads, turnpikes, and bridges constructed by a State or its citizens. I answer that Congress has no such power. The United States cannot use any one of these works without paying the customary tolls."

The court based their opinion also upon the famous case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, to be found in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. In that case the question arose in this way: New York had granted an exclusive privilege to two of her citizens, Livingston and Fulton, to navigate by vessels propelled by steam the waters of New York bay, &c. Another person procured from the Government of the United States a license for a steam vessel. The question arose whether the exclusive right granted by the State of New York could override the license or permission of the Government granted to this vessel. It was claimed by the person holding that license that the power contained in that clause in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution which authorizes the regulation of commerce between the several States overrode the special legislation of the State of New York upon that subject. The supreme court of the State of New York held that the grant to Fulton and Livingston was valid, and the court of errors and appeals of the same State held the same doctrine; but upon an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States Chief Justice Marshall reversed their decision in that particular. He said it was within the power of Congress to regulate commerce in that way, and that the exclusive grant by the Legislature of the State of New York could not interfere with or prevent the right of the person holding that license thus to exercise his privilege with his coasting vessel; but at that time, in establishing that doctrine, the court held this doctrine:

"That inspection laws may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce will not be denied; but that a power to regulate commerce is the source from which the right to pass them is derived cannot be omitted. The object of inspection laws is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of a country; to fit them for exportation, or it may be for domestic use. They act upon the subject before it becomes an article of foreign commerce, or of commerce among the States, and prepare it for that purpose. They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to a General Government; all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass."

That is, this mass reserved to the States.

"No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress; and consequently they remain subject to State legislation."

I do not know but that I shall weary the Senate by a reference to any other authority; but still there is one to be found in 14 Howard in the case of Veazie and others against Moor, and I will beg leave once more to tax the indulgence of the Senate while I read a portion of the decision of Mr. Justice Daniel in that case, because he expresses the views I entertain much more ably and specifically than I can do myself. The question arose in this way: The State of Maine granted the exclusive navigation of the upper portion of the Penobscot river to a company who were to improve it. The court declared that that was not in conflict with the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and a license to carry on the coasting trade did not entitle the vessel to navigate the upper waters of the river, upon the main ground that it was a matter entirely within the control of the State; it was a matter of internal commerce. Mr. Justice Daniel examined this whole question, and the claim under the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which was set up by the person claiming to navigate the river in that particular instance. He says:

"These categories are, first, commerce with foreign nations; second, commerce among the several States; third, commerce with the Indian tribes. Taking the term commerce in its broadest acceptation, supposing it to embrace not merely traffic, but the means and vehicles by which it is prosecuted, can it properly be made to include objects and purposes such as those contemplated by the law under review? Commerce with foreign nations must signify commerce which in some sense is necessarily connected with these nations, transactions which, either immediately or at some stage of their progress, must be extra territorial. The phrase can never be applied to transactions wholly internal between citizens of the same community, or to a polity and laws whose ends and purposes and operations are restricted to the territory and soil and jurisdiction of such community. Nor can it be properly concluded, that because the products of domestic enterprise and agriculture or manufactures, or in the arts, may ultimately become the subjects of foreign commerce, that the control of the means or the encouragements by which enterprise is fostered and protected is legitimately within the import of the phrase foreign commerce, or fairly implied in any investiture of the power to regulate such commerce. A pretension as far reaching as this would extend to contracts between citizen and citizen of the same State, would control the pursuits of the planter, the grazier, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the immense operations of the collieries, and mines and furnaces of the country; for there is not one of these avocations the results of which may not become the subjects of foreign commerce, and be borne either by turnpikes, canals, or railroads, from point to point within the several States, toward an ultimate destination, like the one above mentioned. Such a pretension would effectually prevent or paralyze every effort of internal improvement by the several States; for it cannot be supposed that the States would exhaust their capital and their credit in the construction of turnpikes, canals, and railroads, the remuneration derivable from which and all control over which might be immediately wrested from them because such public works would be facilities for a commerce which, while availing itself of those facilities, was unquestionably internal, although intermediately or ultimately it might become foreign.

"The rule here given with respect to the regulation of foreign commerce equally excludes from the regulation of commerce between the States and the Indian tribes the control over turnpikes, canals, or railroads, or the cleaning and deepening of water-courses exclusively within the States, or the management of the transportation upon and by means of such improvements. In truth, the power vested in Congress by article one, section eight, of the Constitution, was not designed to operate upon matters like those embraced in the statute of the State of Maine, and which are essentially local in their nature and extent."

This practice on the part of the State of New Jersey is not singular; it does not stand alone. The same course has been pursued in other States of the Union. It has been done in the State of Maryland, in the State of Pennsylvania, and in the State of New York. Let me give you a few of the precedents in those States:

"The Legislature of Maryland, by an act of 1832, authorized the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to construct a branch road from Baltimore to the city of Washington, fixed the fare of each passenger at $2 50; and then required the company to pay semi-annually to the Treasurer of the Western Shore of Maryland one fifth of the whole amount received for the transportation of passengers over their said branch road.

"The Legislature of Pennsylvania, by an act of 21st of April, 1846, granted assent of the State to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to locate and construct a continuation of their railroad from the town of Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the city of Pittsburgh; and required the company to pay every six months into the treasury of the State, as a tax or duty on all tonnage except the ordinary baggage of passengers transported on that continuation of road, such a tax as the Legislature might impose, not exceeding three mills per ton per mile; and in addition thereto a tax or duty on all passengers that may have passed, during each preceding six months, a distance of one hundred miles or more of said road between these points, at such rate as the Legislature might direct, not exceeding fifty cents for each passenger, until the construction of a railroad connecting the Baltimore and Ohio railroad with the Cumberland Valley railroad by the Cumberland valley; after that the tax or duty not to exceed twenty-five cents for each passenger.

"By an act of 26th of March, 1846, the Legislature of Pennsylvania granted authority to the New York and Erie Railroad Company to extend their line of railroad from a point in the village of Port Jervis, in the State of New York, across the Delaware river into the county of Pike, in the State of Pennsylvania, and up the valley near the shore of the river, a distance not exceeding thirty miles; and the stock of the company equal in amount to the cost of such construction in Pennsylvania was made subject to taxation in the same manner and to the same amount as other similar property was or might be made subject. And the company was further required, after the completion and operation of their road to Dunkirk or its connection with any railroad to Lake Erie, to pay into the treasury of Pennsylvania, the annual sum of $10,000, on the penalty of forfeiture of the rights and privileges granted by the act.

"In the State of New York, too, we find an act as early as April 15, 1817, respecting navigable communication between the great western and northern lakes and the Atlantic ocean; and for the purpose of raising a canal fund various taxes were imposed, among others 'a tax of one dollar upon each steamboat passenger for each and every trip or voyage such passenger may be conveyed on board of any steamboat over one hundred miles; and half that sum for any distance less than one hundred miles and more than thirty miles.'"

I refer to these instances for the purpose of showing that if the practice of my State is entitled to all these epithets of usurpation and pretension, that the State does not stand alone in her practice in relation to assessing or levying tolls upon passengers passing from one State to another in different sections of the Union. How is it in relation to other charters and other companies? I would pause for a moment to ask you about your manufacturing companies. If you may pass such a bill as this in relation to railroads, why may you not, under the pretense that you have the power to regulate commerce, interfere with the charters of gas companies and all the manufacturing companies of the country, because their operations are in aid of commerce and have a great deal to do with commerce between the States, not only the internal commerce of the States, but foreign commerce? I grant that in a clear case where power is expressly granted the General Government is supreme, but in a doubtful case it should never be resorted to, especially in times like these.

Mr. President, I am no friend to the odious doctrine of State rights, as taught by Mr. Calhoun and adhered to by his disciples and followers; but I am opposed to centralization and to the absorption by the General Government of all the powers of the States. Our system is a complex one, composed of checks and balances, guards and counterguards. Destroy these, and all harmony and all union is gone. The States are not to dwarf and nullify the Union, nor are the States to be dragged like captives chained to the chariot-wheels of the Union. It was well said by a distinguished gentleman upon a recent distinguished occasion:

"We are a nation—no doubt a peculiar one—a nation formed of States; and no nation, except these States form it; and they are States, but they are no States except as they are States in that nation. Historically they never were; and they have no more right to repudiate the nation than the nation has a right to repudiate them; and neither of them have any shadow of right, and we intend, God helping us, so to vindicate that truth that it shall never be disputed any more in this world."

The General Government is supreme where power is expressly granted; but all other powers are reserved to the States or the people of the States. I ask you, Senators, not to divide and agitate when union and a common purpose are so requisite. Do not harass, vex, and destroy us. This Union has been likened to a temple with its dome reaching high up toward the heavens, whose pillars are constituted by the States. Destroy these pillars and your golden dome will come tumbling to the earth, there to lie and be covered by the accumulated dust of ages.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until Saturday at one o'clock, and make it the special order for that day, with a view to take up the naval appropriation bill. The Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE,] I understand, desires to address the Senate on this subject; and if he desires to take the floor on the pending bill I have no objection to yielding to him for that purpose.

Mr. NYE obtained the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will now yield, I will move that the pending bill be postponed to, and made the special order for, Saturday next at one o'clock. Allow me to say, before that motion is put, that I have neither formed nor expressed an opinion on the pending bill. I hope, however, that on Saturday the Senate will be prepared to dispose of it; otherwise it will stand in the way of important legislative measures. I have no feeling about the bill whatever, but I hope it will be disposed of on Saturday.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that he has important financial measures to consider now?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Army and Navy appropriation bills are pending and ought to be disposed of; and I move to postpone this bill until Saturday and make it the special order, with a view of taking up the naval appropriation bill, and I have expressed the hope that this bill may be disposed of definitely then.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope it may be disposed of then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (S. No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill of the House (H. R. No. 761) extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House having corrected the error in the engrossment of the amendment of the House to the joint resolution of the Senate (S. R. No. 42) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road, the amendment was returned to the Senate for its concurrence.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills, which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 392) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads;" and

A bill (S. No. 413) to establish a bridge across the Ohio river at Cincinnati, Ohio, a post road.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 761) extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) authorizing a contract with William H. Powell for a picture for the Capitol—to the Committee on the Library.

RAILROADS IN MICHIGAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 42) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road.

The amendment was to strike out the words, "and a railroad from Little Bay de Noquette to Marquette, and thence to Ontonagon."

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the Senator from Ohio whether he will not consent that that bill may be laid aside informally for a few moments in order that we may attempt at least to finish the bill in regard to the circuit and district courts for the State of Nevada. Legislation must be completed on that matter before the 27th of the present month, or a number of causes in the Supreme Court of the United States will drop and be lost to the parties. The United States is a party in several of those causes, and its interests are concerned.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should not have the slightest objection except that I am informed that the Senator from Nevada is likely to discuss the bill at some length, and the naval appropriation bill ought to be acted upon.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course I do not desire to cut the Senator from Nevada short, but I can hardly believe that a great deal of time will be consumed in suggesting such alterations as he wishes in this bill, or such reasons as he wishes to urge why the bill should be passed as it came from the House of Representatives. Certainly it seems to me that we should have action on this bill, and not delay. I can hardly think a delay of the appropriation bill for an hour, or two even, which would be, I presume, longer than the time occupied with this bill, would be detrimental to the public interests. Here are the rights of a State, the rights of parties, and the rights of the United States, that require legislation before the 27th day of the present month. It must be had before that time, or certain rights will be lost, irretrievably lost.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should have no objection to allowing that bill to be proceeded with if the Senator from Nevada did not desire to discuss it.

Mr. STEWART. I do desire to discuss the bill, although I am not particular about discussing it at this time, and I do not think there is any such pressing necessity for the passage of the bill. We want a district court in Nevada, as a matter of course; but rather than have it incumbered with provisions which we regard as oppressive and odious, we prefer that the whole bill should be lost, and that we should go without a court for a year. We have had some little experience of inefficient, bad courts, an experience which has been sad indeed. We have labored under disadvantages and with courts that were a curse to the country, and we have not complained. Now, we prefer that the bill should be defeated entirely rather than have the amendments reported by the committee incorporated upon it. I wish to be heard in regard to those amendments. I feel exceedingly pained, being a new Senator here, that I am called upon at so early a period to insist upon a matter which I regard as of such great importance to the constituents whom I represent. Still, whenever this bill is to be acted upon, I desire to be heard. It is entirely immaterial, so far as we are concerned, whether it is taken up now or taken up at some future day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object, then, to the motion being entertained, and prefer going on with the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, it cannot be entertained. The naval appropriation bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the same course had better be taken with regard to this bill that was pursued in acting on the legislative appropriation bill; and that is, to vote on each amendment as it is reached in order in reading the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was in lines nine and ten to strike out "$23,327,722 50" and insert "$22,250,000," as the appropriation for "pay of commission, warrant, and petty officers and seamen, including the engineer corps of the Navy."

Mr. SHERMAN. Since that amendment was reported, upon further and more careful examination of the estimates, I am satisfied that the original item is correct; I therefore ask that the amendment be rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in line nineteen to strike out the words "and so forth" after "seamen;" so as to make the item read:

For bounties to seamen, $1,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines one hundred and five and one hundred and six to reduce the appropriation for clothing for the Marine corps from $328,512 to $239,688.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from the items of appropriation for the Boston navy-yard "commencing building for sawing, planing, and working heavy wood-work for ships; two building slips; provision store," in lines one hundred and forty-eight, one hundred and forty-nine, and one hundred and fifty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out, in lines one hundred and sixty-one and one hundred and sixty-two, "paint-shop" and "officers' houses" from the items of appropriation for the New York navy-yard.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines one hundred and ninety-seven, one hundred and ninety-eight, and one hundred and ninety-nine, to strike out "commencing quay wall at foundry; completing one half of storehouse; paint-shop; commencing timber shed," from the items of appropriation for the Mare Island navy-yard.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines two hundred and thirty-two and two hundred and thirty-three, to strike out from the appropriations for the Portsmouth magazine the items "metal store and pattern loft; quarters for inspector of ordnance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and forty, to strike out "quarters for inspector of ordnance" from the items of appropriation for the Boston magazine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines two hundred and forty-four, two hundred and forty-five, and two hundred and forty-six, to strike from the items of appropriation for the New York magazine the following, "piling, filling in, and building crib work, on cob-dock, for gun park; quarters for inspector of ordnance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out, in lines two hundred and forty-nine, two hundred and fifty, and two hundred and fifty-one, the following items from the appropriations for the Philadelphia magazine, "building for general ordnance purposes, including office, store-rooms, and workshops, and for quarters for inspector of ordnance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines two hundred and fifty-seven and two hundred and fifty-eight, to strike out "for quarters for inspector of ordnance" from the items of appropriation for the Washington magazine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the items of appropriation for the Mare Island magazine, to strike out in line two hundred and sixty-four "brick-wall to inclose magazine grounds," and in line two hundred and sixty-eight "commencing ordnance building."

Mr. HALE. I wish the chairman of the Committee on Finance would state why they have stricken out the appropriation for these two items and yet make no diminution in the sum appropriated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can answer the Senator. The House of Representatives reduced the amount of the estimates, but omitted to strike out the items. We have simply made the bill conform to the action of the House. The amount estimated for is larger than the amount appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to reduce the appropriation "for preparing for publication the American Nautical Almanac" from $33,605 to $25,850.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines three hundred and three hundred and one, in the following words:

To meet emergencies at the Atlantic, East and West Gulf, and Mississippi stations, $1,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from lines three hundred and four to three hundred and twenty-four, as follows:

For pay of clerks in the ordnance department at the several navy-yards, in lieu of the present per diem pay, namely:

For salary of one clerk at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, navy-yard, $1,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,200, and one at $1,000 per annum, at Boston navy-yard, $2,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,200 per annum, and one clerk at $1,000 per annum, at the New York navy-yard, $2,200.

For salary of one clerk at the Philadelphia navy-yard, $1,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,400, one clerk at $1,000, one draughtsman at $1,600, one analytical chemist at $2,500 per annum, one assistant pyrotechnist at $1,400, and one keeper of magazine at $480 per annum, at the Washington navy-yard, $8,380.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the second section of the bill, in the following words:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That one midshipman, in addition to those now allowed by law, shall be appointed for each congressional district and Territory, to be appointed on the nomination of the present members of Congress or Delegates from said districts or Territories respectively, but no midshipman shall be appointed for any district not represented in Congress.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the section which is proposed to be stricken out, by striking out all after the word "that" in the first line down to and including the word "but" in the fifth line; so that if amended as I propose it will read—

That no midshipman shall be appointed for any district not represented in Congress.

I believe that is the law now, and I believe that Congress has tried at almost every session since I have known anything about the Naval Academy to get that law enforced; but we have been entirely unable to do so. I do not know how it has been during the last year, but I know that appointments were made in violation of law. This provision has been enacted in various forms, and I think at the last session we inserted a provision that none of the money appropriated for the support of the Academy should be applied to the education of any midshipman not appointed in accordance with the provisions of law, and we made the same provision in regard to West Point; but we have failed hitherto. It is said that there may be something gained by repeating a thing pretty often. It is not impossible that Congress may make provisions of law so often and so frequently that by and by the Departments will attend to them. I think it would be as well to make this provision. It will not alter the law, and it may be an admonition in that regard.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator's amendment will not alter the law, there is no object in offering it. That is my answer on that point. The section itself as it comes from the other House is objectionable because it proposes to increase the number of midshipmen in the Naval Academy to the extent of nearly two hundred, or one additional for each congressional district, when the present buildings are insufficient for the present number. The Committee on Finance did not think it wise to increase the number; they cannot be educated there, and therefore the committee deem it better to omit the whole section. The Senator from New Hampshire says that his amendment will leave the law to stand precisely as it does now, but I see no use in renewing an old controversy.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that it is of any use. I do not know that we can pass a law which will be observed and respected.

Mr. GRIMES. It is quite apparent that the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, if it should be adopted, would change the law. If it should be adopted the section would read, "That no midshipman shall be appointed for any district not represented in Congress." That would take away from the President the power to appoint the midshipmen at large that he is now authorized to appoint. It certainly changes the law in that regard.

Mr. HALE. They are not appointed from districts.

Mr. GRIMES. But this says that "no midshipman shall be appointed for any district not represented in Congress." I am not aware that any during the last year have been appointed outside of the provision of law referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire. I have not heard of it before. It may be so, but I am not aware of it.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that such appointments have been made from any district; but that such appointments have been made, and that that is the basis upon which the Department has acted in making appointments, cannot be unknown to the Senator from Iowa. I do not say that it has been so for the last year.

Mr. GRIMES. I know that there were some appointed two years ago, but I am not conscious of any having been appointed since we passed a law on the subject.

Mr. HALE. I do not know how that is.

Mr. GRIMES. The law that was passed three years ago, according to my construction, and that construction was given to it by the Attorney General, and by the Senator from New York [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON], authorized the Secretary of the Navy to appoint at large under certain circumstances; and he made those appointments. We have had that subject before us, I believe, off and on for two years. Last year Congress made a provision similar to this to which the Senator from New Hampshire has called the attention of the Senate, and to which there was no objection in the Senate so far as I know, and I have never been informed that that law has been violated in a single instance. If it has been, I have never heard of it.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to offer an amendment to the section before the question is taken on the motion to strike it out. I move to strike out all of the section after the word "that," and to insert:

Each member of Congress and each Delegate from the Territories may present the names of two boys as apprentices to the Naval School, and that the necessary number of midshipmen shall thereafter be selected from such apprentices in such manner as the Secretary of the Navy may direct.

I offer this amendment in accordance with a recommendation found in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which I think deserves attention. I will read briefly from it; and the words I shall now read will be my argument in favor of the amendment. The Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report, says:

"Commencing as apprentices on the school-ship, it would be well to open to the sailor-boy the way to promotion by giving him an opportunity, if he shall deserve it, of entering the Naval Academy. From among the apprentices on the school-ship, a selection of one half of midshipmen annually appointed might be made with great advantage to the service and the country. These apprentices, in their preliminary training on the school-ship, will have developed their capabilities and aptitude for the profession, and in transferring them to the Academy there will not be the manifold errors which attend so large a portion of those who are appointed under the present system. Were each congressional district authorized to place two or more apprentices on the school-ship, and the annual selection of midshipmen, or one half of the midshipmen, directed to be made from these apprentices, its effect would be most beneficial to the sailor, as well as the schools and the service. It would popularize the Navy, and open to those who may have enlisted the highest positions and honors of the service."

I believe that that is sound argument. I believe that it would result in giving us a better class of officers in the Navy than we now have or than we can have by the present system of appointment. I confine the amendment in the mode of selection to members of Congress, and Delegates from Territories for this reason, and this reason alone: that it is the mode which has been heretofore pursued, and that to the passage of any bill or amendment affecting the present system we must of course have the assent of the other House, and we shall not be likely to obtain that assent by taking this patronage entirely away from the members of that body. The system suggested in the bill now before us, the system contained in the second section, seems to me to be very objectionable and obnoxious.

That section, as the House of Representatives have passed it, is in these words:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That one midshipman, in addition to those now allowed by law, shall be appointed for each congressional district and Territory, to be appointed on the nomination of the present members of Congress or Delegates from said districts or Territories respectively, but no midshipman shall be appointed for any district not represented in Congress.

Why should "the present members of Congress" nominate this immense addition to the Navy; gentlemen just about to terminate their official term thus to be authorized to give us an immense increase of those who are to be our naval heroes hereafter? I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate, but I think a change can be made in the manner suggested in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and the change that I propose in the amendment is, as the Senate will observe, suggested by what I think is a discreet and sensible recommendation of that officer.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not prepared to say that the suggestion of the Senator from California, if properly carried out, might not be very advantageous to the Government. I am rather inclined to think it would be, but I think the Senate is hardly prepared to adopt this amendment at this time. It is a subject that ought to be embraced in a bill by itself, and not be appended to an appropriation bill. The amendment proposed by the Senator is that each member of Congress—that I suppose includes Senators as well as members of the House of Representatives—

Mr. CONNESS. I do not so intend it.

Mr. GRIMES. Then reading it, as I understand the Senator desires and intends it to be read, it is that each member of the House of Representatives and each delegate from a Territory may present the names of two boys as apprentices to the Naval School. Now we have no apprentices to the Naval School.

Mr. CONNESS. This will establish them.

Mr. GRIMES. Are we prepared to do that? Does the Senator intend that they shall come in addition to two midshipmen from each district that are there now? Is he prepared to increase the number of young men at the Academy to about a thousand, and if so, where is he going to get the facilities for accommodating them? The present facilities are stretched to the utmost tension, and there is not really proper accommodation for the number now there.

Mr. CONNESS. As I understand it, and as the Secretary of the Navy recommends, these scholars are to go to school-ships, which can be very readily appropriated by the Navy Department for that purpose.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator misapprehends.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say that I only present this as, I think, an improvement. I am not disposed to press it, but I hope the Senate will consider the proposition.

Mr. GRIMES. I think it would be an improvement if it was carried out, but it is impossible to carry it out under the amendment proposed by the Senator from California. We now have an apprentice system; we have two schoolships; one in the harbor of New York, in which boys are placed as soon as they are enlisted into the service until they are twenty-one years of age, and after a certain number have accumulated on that ship they are sent to the Sabine, that is now lying in Hampton Roads, and there they are instructed so far in their profession that they can be of service to the Government, and then they are detailed from that ship to other ships and serve as sailors growing up. Now, what the Secretary of the Navy proposes is to take these young men from that ship, a certain number of them, and transfer them to the Academy.

Mr. CONNESS. Precisely.

Mr. GRIMES. But this amendment would not meet that case. This would authorize each member and delegate in the House of Representatives to select two boys from his district and send them to the Naval Academy, and then the necessary number of midshipmen would have to be selected from those thus sent. That would only be accomplishing exactly what you accomplish now, except that you would increase the number by two, in place of increasing it by one, for each district, as proposed by the House bill. You give the power of appointment to each member and delegate in the other House to appoint two young lads under the name of apprentices, and send them to the Naval Academy. You do not, by the amendment, reach the apprentices, the young men who have been performing the practical duties of a sailor on board a vessel-of-war.

Mr. CONNESS. My purpose perhaps served in presenting this question even as briefly as I have done to the Senate. It is apparent that there is a majority of this body in favor of a more popular and sensible selection of persons to be sent to the Naval School, as also to the school at West Point. Last year the honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] took up the latter subject, and many of us differed from that Senator only as to the scheme that he proposed for carrying his plan into effect. It is apparent that so far as this branch of Congress is concerned we are ready for a change, and a beneficial change, in these respects, and I hope that before another session shall be over the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, as well as the honorable Senator from Rhode Island who has taken so much interest in the West Point question, will be prepared to give us a proper system according to which this great reformation can be made. I now withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from California being withdrawn, the question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, which is to strike out the second section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer the following amendment, to come in after line two hundred and seventeen, on page 10:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, authorized to purchase the balance of square numbered nine hundred and forty-eight in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, some fourteen thousand feet, upon which a naval hospital is now in course of erection.

It will be observed that this amendment makes no appropriation; it merely authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to pay out of what is called the hospital fund the amount of money that is necessary to make this purchase, which I understand will be about two thousand dollars. This hospital fund, as members of the Senate are aware, is a contribution made out of the monthly pay of every officer and man in the service, and it is applied for the purpose of taking care of them when sick. That is the fund with which hospitals are built, and with which this ground is to be purchased.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer another amendment, by the instruction of the Committee on Naval Affairs:

And be it further enacted, That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated to enlarge the accommodations for sick, wounded, &c., at the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, authorized by act of Congress of March 14, 1864.

It is known to the Senate, I suppose, that we have one Naval Asylum in the neighborhood of Philadelphia. I have letters here from the chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, and from the Secretary of the Navy, calling the attention of the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, and, through that committee, of the Senate, to this subject, and especially calling attention to the report made by the chief of the bureau last December. I will read an extract from that report:

"NAVAL ASYLUM, PHILADELPHIA.—There is obviously a great want of additional accommodation at this establishment, as well on account of the progressive increase of beneficiaries as of hospital cases.

"The admissions to the hospital department during the year 1860 were but one hundred and seventy-nine, while during the year 1863 they amounted to nearly one thousand. It is not probable that either patients or beneficiaries will diminish in number, certainly not the latter, for years to come; on the contrary, it may be reasonably expected the number will increase.

"The sum of $75,000 was appropriated by act of Congress, approved March 14, 1864, to extend the building; but the derangement of business and enormous increase in the price of labor, material, and everything necessary for the prompt execution of the work, rendered it inexpedient to commence operations with such limited means; and rather than have the grounds defaced and disfigured by undertaking what there was no certainty of soon completing, I have abstained from commencing operations until further appropriations are made. I have not asked for additional means, because of the inopportune times; but still, believing that our necessities will not diminish, I submit to the Department whether it may not find it proper to ask for the further sum of $100,000, which I have not included in the estimates.

"A system of transferring patients from one naval hospital to another has enabled us thus far to meet the want of accommodation at Philadelphia; but this is an uncertain reliance, especially in view of the continued growth of the Navy and the casualties of war."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer the following amendment from the same committee:

And be it further enacted, That to defray the necessary expenses of the commission to select the most approved site for a navy-yard or naval station on the Mississippi river, or upon one of its tributaries, the sum of $2,500 is hereby appropriated.

This amendment is moved in compliance with a communication made to Congress by the Secretary of the Navy, to which was appended a list of items showing the expenditures made by the commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer another amendment, which does not come from the committee, but is offered on my own motion:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the second section of the act entitled "An act to increase and regulate the pay of the Navy of the United States," approved June 1, 1860, as provided that the officer charged with experiments in gunnery at the navy-yard at Washington shall receive the sea-service pay of the grade next above him, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I will explain this to the Senate in a moment. I think the first law that was passed on the subject of the ordnance officer at the Washington yard was in 1851, when it was declared that the lieutenant in charge of ordnance at that yard, that lieutenant at that time being the present Admiral Dahlgren, should receive the sea pay of the grade next above him, which was the sea pay of a commander. When in 1860 we passed a law fixing the pay of officers in the Navy there was a clause added to it declaring that "the officer now in charge of the experiments in gunnery at the Washington navy-yard" should receive the sea pay of the grade next above him. The word "now" was twice inserted in the clause, I remember, in order as it was supposed to make it certain that if Commander Dahlgren should be detached to some other duty and some one else be sent there the provision would not apply to his successor. It has, however, been decided by the Treasury Department that they cannot tell who may be detached to this position, and they continue to pay to the officer in charge the sea pay of the grade next above him. This amendment is to restore the law as it originally stood, and let the ordnance officer at the Washington navy-yard stand like the ordnance officer at every other navy-yard.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the United States Naval Academy shall not be returned to and established at the Naval Academy grounds in Annapolis, in the State of Maryland, before the commencement of the academic year 1867.

I send to the Chair and ask to have read two letters on this subject.

The Secretary read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, February 6, 1865.

SIR: The Secretary of War directs me to refer to you the inclosed copy of a communication of December 28, 1864, from the Surgeon General to him, with relation to the necessity of a general hospital establishment at Annapolis, Maryland, for the reception of our sick and wounded soldiers returned from southern prisons; and to invite your special attention to the necessity for the retention of the Naval School for this purpose, to avoid the expenditure of a considerable amount of public money in the erection of suitable buildings to supply the place of the establishment now occupied, and which, under existing laws, is to be restored to its original purposes in the month of May, 1865.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES A. HARDIE,
Colonel and Inspector General.

HON. HENRY WILSON,
Chairman Military Committee United States Senate.

SURGEON GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON CITY, December 28, 1865.

SIR: It having been decided by act of Congress, approved May 21, 1864, that the United States Naval School at Annapolis, Maryland, occupied since the latter part of June, 1861, as a general hospital, shall be restored to its original purposes in the month of May, 1865, I have the honor to report that its retention during the war, or the immediate erection of a general hospital at or near Annapolis, Maryland, for the reception of our sick and wounded returning from southern prisons, is a necessity of the highest importance.

Facility of access by water, purity of atmosphere, and protection from the injurious influences of large cities, with other essential requisites to the treatment and convalescence of this interesting class of patients, can be more advantageously secured there than elsewhere.

The Naval School hospital, possessing all these advantages, with a capacity of nineteen hundred beds, is now in successful operation, and if possible should be continued. Within the past year it has received twelve thousand five hundred patients, a large proportion of whom were exchanged or paroled prisoners arriving by water, many of these being carried direct from the transport ships to the wards, in such condition as to have precluded the possibility of their reaching a more distant hospital.

A tract of forty or more acres on the Pinkney farm, affording a most eligible site, with good water front on the Severn, and unusual facilities for drainage, can be obtained at a reasonable rent.

It is therefore respectfully recommended that, should it become necessary to vacate the Naval School, the Quartermaster General be instructed to effect a lease of the Pinkney farm, and at once give the necessary orders for grading, drainage, and building a wharf, while materials are being collected for the erection of a United States general hospital of two thousand beds, upon the plan indicated in the circular of the War Department of July 20, 1864, and an officers' hospital of two hundred beds upon a plan corresponding with that of the administrative building in the above-circular, modified as shown in the accompanying diagram.

The relative position of buildings to each other, the position of wharf, grading, and drainage of grounds, and laying out of road and walks to be under the superintendence and control of Surgeon B. A. Vanderkief, United States volunteers, with whom will be associated the Medical Director and Medical Inspector of the Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. K. BARNES,
Surgeon General.

HON. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that we have ordered the restoration of the Naval Academy to Annapolis by May next. A portion of the buildings of the Academy are used for hospital purposes. It appears by this statement of the Surgeon General that we have nineteen hundred beds there now. If the Academy is brought back there in May these buildings and grounds must be given up. I have moved to extend the time for bringing back the Academy two years, in order that we may continue to use in the mean time the buildings and grounds for the purposes for which they are now used. If we do that we shall save the expense recommended here for the purchase of forty acres of the Pinkney farm and erecting the proper buildings for the hospital upon it. I think it will be a large saving to the Government. Certainly, if we purchase this land and erect these buildings it must be done at a very large expense. I have therefore offered the amendment for the purpose of extending the time for bringing back the Academy to 1867.

I wish simply to add, in closing, that I have no objection to the Academy coming back there on any general principles. I suppose it is settled it must come back there sooner or later; but it seems to me we had better keep the grounds and buildings for the purposes for which we are now using them until the close of the rebellion.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not want to be uncharitable, but I think the real secret of this movement is that there are some very comfortable dwelling-houses connected with the Naval Academy at Annapolis which are occupied by the Army surgeons, which they are not extremely anxious to abandon. I understand since the motion was made by the Senator to append this as an additional section, that the amount that is likely to be saved by not bringing the Naval Academy back and building a hospital will be $30,000. I congratulate the country, I congratulate the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I congratulate the War Department on the spirit of economy that has so suddenly descended upon them. Thirty thousand dollars! Mr. President, what is that in comparison with restoring your Academy and placing it on the basis where it was? I tell the Senate and I tell the country that it is the sentiment of every man who has visited that Academy and is connected with it that its tone is being most essentially lowered where it is; and I would rather disband it entirely than let it remain where it is, at Newport, for three years more. That is the sentiment of every man connected with it except one, so far as I am able to learn, and I have had communications with nearly every one of them. I say it is a perfect outrage for the War Department to attempt to keep these grounds upon the paltry, miserable excuse assigned in those letters. Save $30,000! I declare, Mr. President, it is a consolation to know that there is a spirit of economy sometimes that makes its appearance from the War Department.

If we want to educate these young men and make them an ornament to their profession, if we want to protect their morals, now scattered all over the city of Newport, some in quarters in one place and some in another, none of them, or hardly any of them, brought in immediate connection with the professors, tutors, and instructors, some of them on shipboard, where they ought not to be, a hospital away, removed off, remote from the Academy; if we want to do justice to these young men, let us restore the Academy to where it belongs, and where it ought never really to have gone from. What should we think if the Navy Department had got possession of West Point and should undertake to keep West Point Military Academy, just as the War Department is attempting to keep the Naval Academy? Why, sir, the Senator from Massachusetts would rise up every day, and every hour of every day, and protest against it, and we should have a flood of bills and resolutions here on the subject.

I trust, Mr. President, that we shall at once dispose of this question as we have disposed of it before. Let the Naval Academy come back to Annapolis; vote to the War Department the $30,000 that is necessary to build a hospital and lease the ground they want; but do not let us cripple the energies of the Navy and destroy, in effect, your Naval Academy by retaining it where it is.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Iowa can construct a hospital of two thousand beds and all the appliances for $30,000, I hope we shall contract with him to build all our hospitals and barracks.

I was not aware that this recommendation was coming in until the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs informed me of it; but I certainly think we are bound to pay regard to the recommendations of the War Department. And I wish to state one thing, Mr. President, which it may seem strange to those who read the debate a year ago I did not state at the time; and that is, in defense of the ancient town of Newport from the charges that have been brought against it upon this floor by officers who have enjoyed the hospitality and have become familiar with the society of that town; a society which, I undertake to say, in refinement, and in culture, and in everything which marks a high civilization, is not in any respect inferior to that of any other city in the Union. The letters to which I refer, it may be recollected, were published in the Globe, the offensive portion of them, but were not read by the Senator from Iowa when he made his speech. He very properly omitted those portions which reflected upon the town of Newport, and which are not in any respect borne out by the facts.

The allegation that Newport is an unfit place for a military or naval academy by reason of the morals of the town is just as untrue as that allegation would be if made of any town in the Union. Undoubtedly the young gentlemen of the Naval Academy are not so well cared for in hotels as they would be in buildings especially constructed for their accommodation; and if the Academy was to be retained at Newport unquestionably there should be proper accommodations erected for it. As for some of the young gentlemen being on board ships, they are on board ships at Annapolis, and always have been on board ships.

Mr. GRIMES. No.

Mr. ANTHONY. Some. One class is always on board ships.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator is altogether mistaken.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then the young gentlemen who are there themselves are mistaken, for I have heard them say that they were on board ships, and speak of the tricks played upon the youngsters when they first got into their hammocks.

Mr. GRIMES. The system of having a part of a class on board ship had only been in vogue one year when the Academy was removed, and has been pronounced by one of the very best officers of the Navy, and one of the most accomplished, a former commandant of midshipmen, Mr. Rodgers, and, I think, a citizen of the Senator's own town, as an entire failure, and it ought to be abolished and the boys kept on land. I have his letter to that effect.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand the accommodations at Annapolis are not sufficient for all the pupils of the Academy, and that some of them are necessarily obliged to be on shipboard. Am I wrong in that?

Mr. GRIMES. With the increase in the number of the Academy at this time, I think they could not all be accommodated on land.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now I will ask the Senator if, in his opinion, so many of them could be accommodated on land at Annapolis as are now accommodated on land at Newport?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; a great many more.

Mr. ANTHONY. I differ from the Senator there. I do not believe the whole accommodations of the School at Annapolis are equal to the accommodations procured on shore at Newport now.

But I rose not for the purpose of debating the question. Congress have decided that the Naval School shall be removed back to Annapolis. I rose mainly to defend the town of Newport from these charges brought against its public morals, and which I pronounce utterly unjust: the charges that Newport is an immoral place, or that the young gentlemen are subjected to temptations there that they would not be in any other place in the Union of equal size. The Senator did not bring the charges, but they were printed in the Congressional Globe. The Senator did not read them here. If they had been read here, I should have replied to them at the time.

Mr. SPRAGUE. When this question was brought before the Senate a year ago, and my colleague took upon himself the urging of the request that Congress and the Government of the United States would retain the Naval Academy at Newport, I felt too diffident to interpose. At the beginning of this war it was my fortune to arrive at Annapolis about the time when the frigate Constitution was saved from destruction by the rebels. It seems to me that if there is any question as to the policy of the Government at this time, its economy, or otherwise, that question should be decided in favor of retaining the Academy where it now is, rather than removing it, until the excitement of the times and all the passions incident to them shall have subsided by the settlement of this war. It seems to me now, as it did at that time, that although Maryland has commended herself to the country and to the world, so important an interest as the Navy and the proper education of its officers should not be brought so near the confines and the borders of this rebellion as Annapolis will bring it.

I have no particular partiality for Newport, but I take occasion to say here that the remarks said to have been made by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs as to the immorality of that place cannot be true. The climate is too cold, far too cold, to have upon its inhabitants or upon those at the Academy such an effect as has been suggested by him, or by any one else who may have made that suggestion in defending Annapolis at the expense of Newport.

A State which has produced a Perry—and I call Perry to my mind now because the picture at present in the rotunda brings to the mind of this generation the exploits of the past—I say the State which has produced such men and such results is not an inappropriate school to cultivate and to strengthen the minds of men who are to be connected with the Navy, and who are to carry out and to extend from this time hereafter the results of victory wherever the Navy may carry our flag. I trust, sir, the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Naval Committee, will disclaim any intention to condemn Newport or to condemn any associations of Newport as being an inappropriate place in consequence of any immorality alleged against it to its disparagement as a site for the Naval School.

Mr. GRIMES. I beg leave to say to the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE], to the Senate, and to the citizens of Newport, that I have not said a single word now or at any other time in disparagement of Newport. The Senator's colleague has already admitted in advance that I did not read the sentence to which exception has been taken. It was embraced in a letter which was accidentally handed to the reporter and was thus transferred into the debate. I did not read it here in the Senate and had nothing in the world to do with its publication. I have not said anything now in regard to Newport and its immorality or its morality. I have no doubt, from the specimens we have of Rhode Island on the floor of the Senate, that they are a remarkably moral, pure, high-toned, honorable people. But that is not the question before us. The question is whether it is expedient for us to retain the Naval Academy right in the center of a town, in a hotel with nothing around it except a mere artificial line, and then say that if a boy steps over that line to get an orange or to reach toward any temptation, no matter what, that may be before him there, he shall be marked with ten or fifteen demerit marks at a time, and then when the demerit marks have reached one hundred that he shall be turned out of the Academy. I ask gentlemen to put themselves in the place of the fathers of these boys and let them answer for themselves whether they would like to have their sons placed in such an attitude as that, where they would be so liable to be disgraced and degraded. That is the condition in which we are asked to keep these young lads who are intrusted to us for safe-keeping.

Mr. SPRAGUE. All I ask in the disposition of this question is that you shall wait until the war is over before the Academy is removed. Then put it in Florida or Texas or anywhere else that you choose, but wait until peace shall have been restored, until the flag of the Union shall float permanently and surely over Maryland, as well as over every other southern State, before you remove this most important institution.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADE. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the bill as additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist of the vice admiral, one rear admiral, one commodore, one captain, one commander, and one lieutenant commander, over which the Secretary of the Navy or the officer of highest rank present shall preside; and when the subject under consideration shall appertain to the duties of any bureau in the Navy Department, the chief of such bureau shall be a member of the board, and entitled to sit and vote on the subject.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the board shall deliberate in common and advise the Secretary on any matters relating to naval organization, naval legislation, the construction, equipment, and armament of vessels, navy-yards, and other naval establishments, and the direction, employment, and disposition of the naval forces in time of war, when required by him. All such opinions shall be recorded.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That no vessel-of-war shall be built or materially altered, nor any guns of new construction ordered or adopted, nor any engine for any vessel-of-war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon; and all courts-martial ordered by the Secretary of the Navy shall be detailed by the board.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That all invitations for plans or proposals for any of the works above mentioned shall be prepared by the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary; and all bids or offers or proposals for the same shall be opened in the presence of the board, and the award made by it, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary may add to the board from time to time other officers of the Navy eligible to the position of chief of bureau, not exceeding three at any time, for consultation on any of the above subjects. The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects, in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

I do not propose to detain the Senate long on this amendment. It is the same proposition which was offered in the House of Representatives, agreed to there in Committee of the Whole, and afterward rejected by a very small majority. I suppose that if the House could get hold of it again they would probably pass the provision, although I do not know that it is exactly in order for me to refer to that here.

Sir, I have known but little about the Navy Department or its proceedings; comparatively nothing until the committee to which I belong, under instructions from the Senate, proceeded to examine the facts in regard to the building of the twenty light-draught monitors. We proceeded in that investigation until I am entirely convinced that there should be somebody responsible for the manner in which your appropriations are expended. When I say this, I do not intend to cast any reflection on that Department. In the immense amount of business thrown upon their hands, I know that without the aid and the earnest coöperation and assistance of the boards of construction, it would be impossible for the Secretary of the Navy and his immediate assistants to give such care and attention to matters as the necessities of the case require.

But, sir, the $10,000,000 that you ordered to be expended in the construction of light-draught monitors have been expended without that care and attention which the importance of the subject demanded. I am entirely satisfied of that, and I think it is because the board of construction was composed of gentlemen who do not believe in any of the late improvements in building ships-of-war.

Mr. GRIMES. To whom does the Senator refer?

Mr. WADE. I refer particularly now to Mr. Lenthall. I do not think he believes much in your iron-clads or monitors, or anything of that kind. I do not say he ought to be a believer in them; but I think his opinion is that the old method of building our ships-of-war was about the perfection of the art of ship-building. At all events the testimony is—I cannot exhibit it here before the Senate as I wish I could, because much of it is now in the stenographer's notes, which I cannot read—that the board refused to have much to do with this. For instance—

Mr. GRIMES. I inquire of the Senator what board he refers to?

Mr. WADE. The board of construction.

Mr. GRIMES. Who composed that board?

Mr. WADE. Mr. Lenthall, Mr. Isherwood, and somebody else.

Mr. GRIMES. Who is the other one?

Mr. WADE. I do not remember his name. They were the principal men of the board. Mr. Stimers was charged with making calculations for building these ships, and he drew draughts of them. He was exceedingly busy and had but little time to spare. He had not time to attend to this because his time was nearly all occupied with other matters. He went to Mr. Lenthall and told him that he had been compelled to make the calculation of what they call the displacement; that is, to ascertain what the depth of the vessel and its material would be, how much water it would displace, how it would sail, how much of it would be out of water, &c., a calculation that lies at the very threshold of all these inquiries, and which it is most material to get right at the start. Mr. Stimers says that he had a young man whose name I do not now recollect, a very good engineer, a good calculator for a young man, but comparatively inexperienced in this business. I am told that this ascertainment is so essential that it is hardly ever trusted to a single estimate, but different men skilled in the business go through to ascertain that the calculations are all right in this respect at setting out, because if you do not start right here you are in danger of building a ship that will not swim, that will not carry herself, much less the munitions of war, and the coal, &c., which are to be carried. In a steamship the question is more complicated and requires more care. Mr. Stimers's testimony is that the calculations were made by this young man, about twenty-four years of age, who was a bright young man and very well skilled in this business no doubt, but nevertheless Mr. Stimers cautioned the board of construction and Mr. Lenthall that the calculations had been made by the young man and that they ought certainly to be looked to by the board. They, however, as I understand him, refused to have anything to do with them, because they did not believe in these iron-clads or monitors, and they would not make the calculations, and the fact is that your ships were constructed upon the calculations of this young man alone, never ascertained or gone over by anybody else skilled in the business to see whether he had made the calculations right or whether he might not have committed some mistake.

They went on and prepared for the construction of twenty monitors all after the same model and all based upon the calculations of this young engineer, and the consequence was just what we might have expected it would be: your $10,000,000 were expended in the construction of these vessels, and when you came to launch them they would not carry their armor, their turrets, their coal, their munitions of war for a cruise. In other words, they would not swim; and that was precisely the mistake we might have expected. I say it was culpable carelessness in whoever was charged with so grave a responsibility as that not to have taken all the pains that could have been taken to insure that the work was commenced right. Ten million dollars were expended in ship-building, and that, too, in trying a comparatively new thing which I may almost say was an experiment. That should have required greater care than if they were building ships after the old fashion on old models that everybody understood. The proper care was not taken, and consequently these monitors are admitted by the Department to have been a failure.

I am not charging the Department with any delinquency, because I can see well enough that the immense business they had on their hands was such that they could not act on the subject unaided by these boards. They could glance at it occasionally, as they did, but it was impossible for the Department to attend to it without the aid and earnest coöperation of these boards that were furnished by the Government and paid by the Government to take charge of these things and not to let them slip carelessly through their fingers merely because the Government was entering on an experiment which they did not happen to believe in. They should have entered on the business of the Government with the same anxiety to succeed as though they had been building ships in which they themselves had the utmost faith. They would not do it, however, but turned their backs on their duty, as I think and as the evidence discloses, and did not aid the Department at all.

Mr. GRIMES. That is the evidence of Stimers?

Mr. WADE. Yes, I am repeating now more particularly the evidence of Stimers. That is the only witness I have seen who knows all about the subject, except Mr. Lenthall, who does not seem to say much about it, though it is evident that he does not believe in this kind of shipping. I am not now, however, speaking on that branch of the subject. I have very strong opinions myself about these monitors. I think they are good for some purposes, and for others good for but very little. These light-draught monitors, I think, are a total failure. I know that there was a great disparity of testimony on that point before the committee by men who were very competent to judge, infinitely better judges than I am, who am no judge at all; and when we are told that the speed of these monitors was only three and a half miles an hour—

Mr. GRIMES. Which one was that?

Mr. WADE. The Chimo, the one they brought around from Boston. Some say she went four miles an hour, but the most reliable evidence I can get is that her speed was three and a half miles an hour; but that was really no test of it which enabled anybody to say precisely what her speed was. It was barely incidental. It was tried for three or four miles under circumstances that certainly would not be called a test. It is clear, at any rate, that these vessels are very slow, so inactive in the water that they cannot answer the purposes for which they were originally designed. The idea in building them was that they were to be used along the shallow waters of our southern coast and in ascending rivers. The principal design was that they should ascend the rivers. It is perfectly evident that a vessel which cannot be propelled more than three and a half miles per hour can ascend hardly any of our rivers. She could not begin to make headway up the Mississippi, and hardly any other river that she would be called upon to navigate. I do not suppose she could go against tide-water where there was any considerable tide. The current of tides is generally as much as that, and of our rivers something more.

The original purpose for which these monitors were built is admitted on all hands to have failed. They cannot carry their turrets. They have had to throw them aside, after having built them at considerable expense. Then they had a water-tank, the intention being to sink the ship when it was in peril, so as to decrease the surface to be exposed to the fire of the enemy. The cisterns were to be filled with water, and they had an apparatus by which it could be pumped out if they struck bottom. It was thought that would be a most excellent arrangement. Perhaps it would have been, but it did not seem to work. The vessels could not carry the tank and the turrets, and they had to dispense with them and throw them away.

The question then was what to do with the vessels, and that was determined about as loosely as some other things. I believe that when Captain Ericsson found they would not answer their purpose he said, why not make torpedo-boats of them? Then the officers all went in with a hurrah for making torpedo-boats of them; and I believe they have got about six of them, throwing off the turrets, throwing out these water-tanks, and making them as light as possible, and are trying to use them as torpedo-boats. I have inquired of many of our men who ought to be very competent to judge on the subject, whether they would make good torpedo-boats. They have not been able to sail much, only as they are towed by other vessels. They were brought around from Boston under tow. They did not sail themselves. They thought, of course, as anybody would think, that they were not spry enough afoot for torpedo-boats; they are too logy for that. Besides, the same men who speak of them say that we have a torpedo-boat that was built for about eighty thousand dollars, and that, according to the witnesses I have examined, is the very perfection of a craft for that purpose. These monitors cost between four and five hundred thousand dollars apiece, while a torpedo-boat costs about eighty thousand dollars, is spry, can go where it is wanted to go, is most admirably calculated to perform all the duties of a torpedo-boat, according to the testimony of the best men I have been able to examine.

Now, sir, I do not want to enlarge on this subject. I hope these monitors will be able to perform something. After it was found that they were a total failure for the purpose for which they were originally built, as I have stated, a board was organized to take into consideration what might be done with them. They inspected them, examined them, considered the subject, and came to the conclusion that if they were built up twenty-two inches higher on the side they would be able to carry the armor and be of some service. That, of course, would sink them deeper in the water. They were originally contracted to be built so as to draw but six and a half feet of water. They sunk below that, and drew over seven feet in the original state. When you come to build them up in this way, they will probably set eight or nine inches deeper, and draw about seven and a half feet draught, which is rather an objection to their ascending our rivers and navigating the shallow waters for which they were specially designed; but it was thought they might be built up on the sides twenty-two inches higher, and then be able, not to navigate the ocean, but to creep from harbor to harbor and be of some service in harbor defense.

Mr. HALE. What were they built up with?

Mr. WADE. Built up with wood and faced with iron, the same as the original sides were built. I have seen them; I have been on board one of them that was very nearly finished and built up. As I said before, there seems to be a diversity of opinion as to the usefulness of these monitors in their repaired state. When built up twenty-two inches, some of the witnesses think they will be most excellent boats, and will do good service for harbor defense. Others think that they are too light to be of any essential service for that, and really do not think they will be good for anything. I am not competent to judge of that question. I do not know how it will come out, but I hope, considering the vast amount of money they have cost the Government, that they will be of some use. Take, for instance, the one which I was on board of, the Chimo, built in Boston. There the cost of making this change, building up her sides twenty-two inches, was $90,000 more than the original contract price, which, I believe, was $375,000. Adding to that $90,000 for building up these sides, and $50,000 more for other repairs, and you will see how expensive these vessels are; and they have cost millions of dollars more in this repaired state than the original contract price. I have not made an exact estimate of the amount. The cost to be added in consequence of this change depends somewhat upon the state and condition the ship was in when it was ascertained that the original draft was a failure. If they were nearly finished, as the one of which I spoke was, the cost would be more than if it was otherwise. In that case it was $90,000, but in other cases the cost of the change is not so great, because they have not got to take so much of the ship away. It is a good deal of work to prepare the ship for this repair, when it is nearly finished. I do not know that any of them will cost less than $50,000 to build them up, and many will cost considerably more than that.

I make these observations in regard to these ships in order to illustrate the necessity of having a board that are competent to decide these matters and who will take a lively interest in them. I want the board to be men who have to navigate the vessels, high officers, who will have to stake their lives finally upon the success of the ships they order to be built; captains, commodores, admirals, practical men, who know all about that which they are doing, and who have really got to test the experiment they make, and test it, too, at the hazard of their lives. If this old board that sat here from year to year had to sail in these ships I do not think they would show the same indifference that they do now. We want live men, who can follow a new fashion if the Government is determined on a new fashion. Whether we have improved or not improved old things in the Navy have passed away, and behold all things are new, and these old men, undoubtedly well skilled in the old manner of building ships, competent for that business, are perfectly inapplicable to the changed state of things, and it is madness for us, in building up a great and expensive Navy, as we are doing, to leave these improved vessels, to be built on modern models and according to modern experience and theories, to the fate to which they will be subjected if they are committed to the hands of men prejudiced, unskilled perhaps in this new condition of things, not believing in it. They believe we threw away the money when we directed these ships to be built. Believing that, they do nothing by which we can succeed with them.

I hope we shall adopt this amendment, which I think will give us some additional guarantees that these great expenditures of money for a Navy will be carried out to a better purpose than they have heretofore been or probably will be as they now stand.

I trust I shall not be charged with making any attack on the Navy or on the Navy Department. I am compelled by a sense of duty to endeavor to have a reform in this particular. I believe that the condition of your Navy requires it. I believe so on the information I have derived from taking the testimony of the best men we have in the Navy; and if I did not mention it here to the Senate, I should be guilty of the same culpable negligence that I am charging on this old board. I now leave the matter with the Senate, hoping that they will either adopt this amendment or by their wisdom devise some other way which they think will be better adapted to the purpose, for I am not wedded to this. If any one can get up anything better, I will agree to that, and shall beglad to have it done. To me this seems feasible and proper, and I think it will be a great benefit to our Navy if it is adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to move that the Senate go into executive session for a short time, to allow me to make a report; but before doing so I desire to send to the Chair some amendments to the Army appropriation bill, which will be up to-morrow, in order to have them printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we go into executive session I know that an adjournment will follow. I am opposed to it.

Mr. WILSON. Does the Senator want to finish this bill to-night?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. WILSON. Very well; I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have this bill and the Army appropriation bill, and we have to-day and to-morrow to pass them.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to have an executive session in order to move a reconsideration of a vote of the Senate confirming a nomination, and I understand that according to the rules the motion must be made to-day.

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no; at the next executive session.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I do not understand the rule.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator's motion to reconsider will be in order whenever we go into executive session.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust my colleague will not press this amendment. I will not discuss the merits of it; I know nothing about them. The habit of attempting on the appropriation bills to legislate on important matters of this kind without the report of a committee is wrong and ought not to be tolerated.

This amendment does not come from the Naval Committee, nor does it come from the Committee on Finance having charge of this bill. I hope, therefore, that without entering into a general discussion of the merits of the proposition, it may be left to stand by itself. A proposition to reorganize the Navy Department, to make such radical changes as are proposed by this amendment, certainly ought not to be added as an amendment to an appropriation bill. The habit of Senators offering independent propositions of legislation, and hitching them on to the appropriation bills which must be passed, thus creating a controversy between the two Houses, at this period of the session, in my judgment, will endanger the passage of the appropriation bills. I hope, therefore, that without entering into a discussion of the merits of the proposition of my colleague, it will be left to stand as a separate measure. He has the power to introduce a bill reorganizing the Navy Department, and have it taken up and discussed as an independent measure. To attach it to this appropriation bill would lead to a long discussion, carrying the controversy back to the other House, where the same proposition was discussed for two or three days and voted down; and to renew the discussion now, it seems to me, would be unwise at this stage of the session. I shall therefore vote against the amendment without going into the merits of the proposition.

Mr. WADE. I hope that the Senate will vote on this question with no such view. I have no fear about the passage of the appropriation bills. I have been here a great many years, and I never knew an appropriation bill to fail which it was not intended should fail. I knew one appropriation bill to fail, but it was when we were almost in a state of rebellion here; when we had the chief conspirators of the present rebellion here, who intended to make that bill fail, and they succeeded.

That is the only appropriation bill I ever knew to fail.

In my judgment, there is ample time before we adjourn to do everything that ought to be done for the Government, and in my opinion there is nothing more essential than that which I have now offered as an amendment to this bill. There is no danger that it will endanger the appropriation bill. It may postpone its passage for a very short time; but if the Senate, on full consideration, shall reject it, they will pass the original bill, and there will be scarcely anything to dispute about. If they adopt it, it will go back to the House of Representatives; and, my word for it, if it goes there again the House will adopt it; but if they should reject it, there will be the end of it. It is not going to endanger the bill at any rate.

If I am right in what I have endeavored to impress upon the Senate, it is of the first importance that something of this kind should be done. It ought to accompany the appropriation bill. Before you make any other great appropriations for your Navy you ought to have some safeguard that the money will be laid out to the advantage of the public. Here is the very place for it, on this Navy bill where you are making these enormous appropriations. I want to know that the money will be expended carefully by men of skill, and not be wasted. Sir, what is a day here in the Senate compared to wasting $20,000,000 or $10,000,000 on vessels which turn out to be good for nothing? I say to my colleague that he is not subserving the best interests of the country when he is so eager to press the appropriation bills to a conclusion that he will go against and repudiate wholesome amendments. If there was any danger of losing this bill, I would go with my colleague; I would sacrifice everything rather than that the appropriation bills should not pass; but they will not be endangered by this amendment; they certainly will pass. Their own weight will carry them, not, like the monitors, to the bottom, but through both branches of Congress. There is no doubt about that. I hope the Senate will not be biased in voting upon this subject by the consideration that the amendment will endanger the passage of the bill, for it will have no such effect.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It seems to me a little strange that a proposition of this sort should come before the Senate without any reference to the Naval Committee. I concede the wisdom, the statesmanship, the investigation that the committee on the conduct of the war brings to the examination of every question; and I have felt the power of that committee in putting commanders down and putting commanders up. I think the whole country has felt that. Whether its action has been right or not in some cases, I do not choose to discuss; but I believe this is the first time that a measure has been based upon the investigations of that committee touching the mechanism appertaining to the Navy, without allowing the matter to go to the appropriate committee, where the questions of fact can be investigated so that the Senate may act upon a report coming from a committee that is accustomed to the investigation of questions of this sort. The Senate is asked to rely upon testimony which shall condemn an important Department of the Government, and that testimony is yet in short-hand, and taken simply in regard to one class of vessels.

I could say to that Senator—but I am sure no Senator would vote upon a statement of that sort, and with great respect to the Senator I shall not give my vote upon testimony that is only known to that committee—I could say to that Senator that the fact was communicated to the Naval Committee yesterday that the vessels which he has condemned are of great value, and not by men that have an interest in it, not by men that have constructed them, but by the highest architects of the country who had no connection with their construction.

Mr. WADE. The Senator means in their improved condition. He does not contend that the original build of them was not a failure.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not contend any way about it. I refer to this to show the conflict of testimony on the point that the Senator has brought up.

Now, what does the Senator ask? The Senator asks to reorganize the Navy Department to a very large extent, to take these questions that now belong to the Secretary of the Navy from him and to give them to a board, and that question not referred at all to the appropriate committee of this body, and all, too, based upon a criticism of contracts that have been made, and of vessels that have been adopted in the Navy Department, the testimony upon that subject not even translated yet.

I think the Senator from Ohio should at once have yielded to the suggestion of his colleague and not have thrust this question for discussion on the Senate; for surely that Senator knows that the rest of us are not prepared to vote upon it. Why does he ask that power shall be taken from the Secretary of the Navy that now belongs to him? Why does the Senator ask that there shall be a board of five men, as he calls them? For one reason, as is given here, that twenty vessels have been constructed on a drawing or plan suggested by some young engineer, that that young engineer was not qualified, and that the present board did not examine the plans with sufficient care, and that the vessels are not a success. That is the proposition of the Senator; and to support it he relies exclusively on the short-hand notes in the hands of the clerk of his committee.

Mr. WADE. No, I do not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understood the Senator to make that argument. I may have misunderstood him, but that is the way I understood his argument. The evidence was not yet translated, and he could not read it to the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I spoke of one witness. I was asked a question in regard to a witness whose manuscript was not yet written out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Perhaps I gave too much scope to the Senator's argument, but that is the way I understood him. The argument is based on the fact, as urged by the Senator, that these vessels have not been a success, and they have not been investigated here except by the committee on the conduct of the war; and with great respect to the Senator I doubt whether the subject was within the scope of the committee's jurisdiction. What is the conduct of the war? Does that involve the building of vessels?

Mr. WADE. We were specially instructed on that subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I withdraw any suggestion on that question; but I believe that committee was not instructed to bring forth a proposition of this sort. But my point is simply that this proposition has never been to the appropriate committee. It is the reorganization of the Navy Department, which certainly the Senate will not propose to make until the Naval Committee has had an opportunity to consider it. Would it be tolerated here for a moment that we should reorganize the War Department without taking the judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs upon it; or the Post Office Department without hearing the distinguished chairman of that committee upon that subject? Not for a moment.

Therefore I think the suggestion of the chairman of the Finance Committee is a very reasonable one, that the Senate is not now in a condition to decide upon the question. There will be debate upon it; there is no doubt about that; and certainly the Senator's own statement does not entitle this proposition to a peculiar consideration in the body when he informs us that it has already been considered in the House of Representatives and rejected there. He says he knows now, at least he thinks now, the House will change its judgment; but he does not tell us what members have told him they were going to vote otherwise upon the next vote. He may think so, but we have the record now that the proposition he brings before the Senate has been rejected by the other branch of the Legislature. I think the proposition of his colleague is a very reasonable one, that this amendment shall not be pressed, that we shall not go into the investigation of so important a question as this, with the present information of the Senate on the subject.

Mr. WADE. One word in reply to the Senator. He says that we take undue advantage, that I am now speaking of a thing that is unknown to anybody except the committee on the conduct of the war. It would be a very poor compliment to the Naval Committee to assume that they know nothing about the subject to which I have referred; that the committee having special charge of naval affairs and knowing that ten millions of money had been appropriated for the construction of certain vessels which everybody knows, if the Naval Committee do not, have been criticised out of doors and in doors for months, have not taken it under consideration at all. Sir, there is not a Senator here who does not know that the original draught of these monitors was condemned, not by me, but by the Department themselves.

He says my condemnation of these vessels is based on the notes of the stenographer. Why, sir, I do not condemn them more than does the Secretary of the Navy. We wrote to him a communication in regard to it, and I supposed the Naval Committee, who are specially charged with this duty, would do as much as we have done, call on him to know what state and condition these vessels were in, whether they were good, bad, or indifferent, what information he could give us on the subject. I did not bring his manuscript in here because I presumed the Naval Committee knew it as well as or better than I did. That Department do not deny that the original draught of these monitors was a total failure, and the Senate knows it no doubt. Everybody knows that that is the condition of things. Nobody stands forth as their advocate that I know of. You do not want to go through any stenographer's notes to know it. The world knows it. The ship-builders know it. The Naval Committee know it. The question is, can you make anything of them now? I hope you can, but I say as I said before, our investigations show that that is a mooted point, some believing they will be of use for harbor defense, and others thinking that their armature is not stout enough, and being so designed, they cannot be of any considerable use for that purpose. I do not know how that will be. I hope they may prove an entire success, and I am not here to say they will not. I hope they will be a success, but I believe with that portion of the nautical men I have examined, who think they will not be of any considerable use even for harbor defense, for they ought to be of a stouter class, carrying heavier armor, carrying heavy guns, and built for that purpose, for this is an afterthought. If you get any use out of them it is not what they were originally designed for, but it is a mere afterthought to see if you cannot make something out of that which had proved a failure.

And I am told that the Naval Committee do not know anything about it, and that the committee on the conduct of the war have presumptuously come in here to give their opinion! No, sir, it was no pleasure to me to enter into this investigation. I never intended to touch it; I never thought of doing it until the Senate instructed us to enter upon it, and then I had no choice about it. I was compelled to go into it, and I am not to be snubbed off, after you have ordered me to do it, by saying that I know nothing about it, and that I am incompetent to make the investigation. If that were so, you should not have instructed me to go into the investigation. I do not pretend to be competent; but I do pretend that I can examine a witness and that I can tell what he testifies to, and he can tell me whether he is a naval man or not, what office he holds under this Government, and if he is trusted by the Government. If they say he has skill for these things and I examine him, his opinion may be worth something, although mine is not. I know the chairman of the Naval Committee, and a more industrious and astute man never took charge of any subject; and for any one to tell me that he never heard anything about this is all moonshine.

Why did you fail? I tell you that it is a failure. I have told you what the witness to whom I referred testifies about the failure—he who was charged with it, and perhaps the only man who was fully informed on the subject except Mr. Lenah, and whom we did not succeed in getting till two or three days ago. If his testimony was written out I would have brought it here, because I think it very essential. I know but little about him, but I suppose he is an honorable man.

Mr. GRIMES. You refer to Stimers.

Mr. WADE. Yes. I know he is intrusted by the Government with some of the most important trusts you can bestow on a man, and of course the committee have no hesitation in trusting him. He has detailed the facts showing that the old board of construction would not do anything about it, and left these ships to be built upon calculations made by a young man. He cautioned them about that at the time, being taken off into other business and ordered to other duty. He told them all he could tell them, that this was the calculation of a young man comparatively inexperienced, although in other respects a very good man, a commendable young man; but the duty was too important to be trusted to any one, and they failed in consequence. That is all I have said about it; and now let the Senate vote as it pleases on the subject. I have discharged my duty, let others discharge theirs.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood that the chairman of the Committee on Finance had no objection to an adjournment; but if he objects to it I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is manifest that we have not a quorum, and I should like to have a vote taken on the question of adjournment to show that there is not a quorum here. We must press the appropriation bills. If Senators are going to put all the bills on the Calendar upon the appropriation bills as amendments we shall have to sit here a long time.

Mr. ANTHONY. We always do precisely as the chairman of the Finance Committee tells us on occasions like this, and as we have a very good-natured chairman now I thought he would be willing to yield to a motion to adjourn; but as he wishes to call for the yeas and nays, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 16, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. A. B. EARLE, of Abingdon, Massachusetts.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to make a suggestion to the House. I find it very difficult to get meetings of the House in the evening on account of the illness of so many members, and the numerous religious exercises that are going on in this city just at this particular time. I desire to suggest, therefore, that instead of the present evening sessions the House, until otherwise ordered, shall agree to meet at eleven o'clock a. m., and sit until half past five p. m. I think that that will be more comfortable and that we shall get through with more business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I think myself that we shall do a great deal more business in the mode suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The only question is as to meeting at eleven o'clock. Some of the committees I know have a great deal of business to do.

Mr. STEVENS. Our committee propose to meet in the evenings.

Mr. ALLEY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the committees be allowed to sit during the sessions of the House until twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We never could get a quorum under such circumstances.

Mr. STEVENS. Our committee have agreed to meet in the evening.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to call the attention of the House to the business before the Committee of Elections, in connection with the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There are eight cases undisposed of before the Committee of Elections, some of which are before the House, and they are of such a character that it is due both to the parties and to the House that they be disposed of at the earliest possible moment. The House will bear me witness that I have not been pressing them upon the attention of the House so as to interrupt the business of the Committee of Ways and Means, which is of so much importance. It is my intention to bring them before the House, to-morrow, immediately after the morning hour, and of course, when they are before the House, they will be for its disposal. From watching the proceedings of both branches of Congress, it seems to me that it is as well to bring the questions involved in these cases before the House and have them settled in that way as in any other. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to bring them before the House at that time, unless the business now specially before the House from the Committee of Ways and Means, the tax bill, be so far progressed that it is likely to be got through with, or very nearly, at that time.

I do not desire to have any struggle with the Committee of Ways and Means for the floor, but I wish they would recognize the fact that this important business is pressing upon us for consideration and ought to have the ear of the House for a brief time. My own course in reference to these matters I intend to be such as to consume very little of the time of the House. I desire to get a vote of the House upon them, and then my responsibility in the matter shall end, whatever the House may decide. But I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will make no arrangements that will prevent the bringing of that business before the House. I am willing to come here either at eleven o'clock or seven o'clock, and stay here until one o'clock at night, and then if the House see fit to fine me for absence after that hour, I will submit. But I do think I have a right to the ear of the House long enough to dispose of these questions. I have not been troublesome in bringing them before the House, and I would suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that he ought to be willing to let me have the day after the morning hour of to-morrow. If the other measures which have a relation to these election cases were likely to be acted upon now by both branches of Congress, I should be, as I have been all along, anxious to have that action precede the consideration of these subjects.

Mr. STEVENS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to allow us first to complete the consideration of the tax bill.

Mr. DAWES. If I could have Monday after the morning hour, that will be satisfactory to me. I am obliged to ask after to-morrow to be excused for the evening of Saturday.

Mr. MORRILL. I would suggest to my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. STEVENS], that as the arrangement he proposes for meeting at an early hour cannot take effect to-day he will so frame it that it will take effect after this evening, so that we may have this evening, which will probably enable us to get through the tax bill to-morrow.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will allow me to postpone the special order, the reconstruction bill and the election cases, until immediately after the morning hour of Monday next, I will acquiesce.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent for the arrangement I suggest, to meet at eleven o'clock a. m., and sit until five o'clock p. m., and dispense with evening sessions until the House shall otherwise order.

The SPEAKER. To take effect to-day or to-morrow?

Mr. STEVENS. It cannot take effect to-day. To take effect from and after to-morrow.

No objection being made, the suggestion of Mr. STEVENS was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I now ask the House to postpone the reconstruction bill and election cases until Monday next, immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then I object.

Mr. ALLEY. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman allow me to submit a proposition in regard to the business of the Military Committee?

Mr. ALLEY. I will yield a few moments for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to state to the House that a large number of reports are ready to be made from the Military Committee. Besides those reports there are the amendments to the enrollment law, reported and yet to be reported, and which have already been made the special order for the 2d day of February instant, not yet being reached; and I wish to state to the House that beside the amendments to the law relating to the draft, now being postponed only from day to day, including provisions for requiring that men shall be credited to the particular localities in which they live, and some other important considerations connected with the amendment of that law; in addition to those matters we have to bring before the House matters which relate to the pay and allowances of officers, the reorganization of the commissary department, and several other questions of general interest to the country; and I see no prospect that the Military Committee will be called upon at all under the present arrangement. I propose to the House to fix next Monday, or some other day not too far distant, when they will permit the Committee on Military Affairs to make reports and bring subjects for consideration before this House.

A MEMBER. Take Saturday.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; say Saturday; that will suit me.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] withdraws his objection to my motion to postpone the reconstruction bill until Monday next immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the permission asked for by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will be given; not only be given for the day he has named, but I hope special days will be assigned to other committees. For instance, the Committee on Commerce has a great deal of business before them which requires attention, and will call for legislation, and we shall ask that one evening shall be assigned to the Committee on Commerce. I hope there will be no objection to granting the request of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], and then I shall make a request for the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask, then, that Saturday, after the morning hour, be assigned to the consideration of business from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. I must object to that arrangement, unless the gentleman will add "provided that the tax bill be then disposed of." I am not willing that the consideration of that bill shall be interrupted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that understanding, provided our committee be allowed the next unoccupied day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] asks that Saturday after the morning hour shall be exclusively devoted to the consideration of reports from the Committee on Military Affairs, and that if the tax bill be not disposed of prior to that time the Committee on Military Affairs shall have the next unoccupied day, after the morning hour.

Mr. SMITHERS. Under that understanding, would only Saturday be devoted to the consideration of bills from the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. Only Saturday, or one day afterward not taken up by special orders or questions of privilege. Is there any objection to this arrangement? If not, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWES. I desire unanimous consent that the reconstruction bill and the election cases be postponed until Monday next immediately after the morning hour. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] withdraws his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the reconstruction bill and reports from the Committee of Elections on questions of privilege may be postponed until Monday next, after the morning hour.

Mr. DAWES. Then the reconstruction bill would be the special order?

The SPEAKER. It would be the special order. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWES. The reconstruction bill has heretofore been made the special order from day to day until disposed of. I suppose that under this arrangement it will occupy the same position.

The SPEAKER. Being already a special order from day to day until disposed of, it will, being postponed, have the same rights.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask that Thursday, one week from to-day, be set apart, after the morning hour, for the consideration of business from the Committee on Commerce. Although this committee have a great many bills, we think that none of them will excite any discussion. They are mostly bills to carry out the laws in regard to smuggling and the registry of vessels, and in all probability they will generate no debate. Probably we shall not consume more than half an hour; and in that case I am willing that the remainder of the day shall be given to my friend, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. WILSON.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that Thursday next, after the morning hour, shall be devoted to the consideration of reports from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON. I will not object to that, if Wednesday of next week can be set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on the Judiciary. If the present order of the House should be pursued, the regular call of the Committee on the Judiciary would be on Thursday of next week.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire that the Committee on the Judiciary shall have next Wednesday in lieu of the two morning hours to which the committee would be entitled, or beside?

Mr. WILSON. If we can have the whole of Wednesday after the morning hour, that, I think, will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that Wednesday next, after the morning hour, may be assigned to the reports from the Committee on the Judiciary, in lieu of the two morning hours to which that committee would be entitled on subsequent days. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ANCONA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that leave of absence be granted to my colleagues Mr. STILES and Mr. STROUSE, who are absent on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. For the rest of the session?

Mr. ANCONA. Indefinitely.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask unanimous consent that leave of absence be granted to myself during this evening's session.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that Friday of next week, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object. I think that there are too many assignments for special days already.

Mr. STEVENS. If we assign all the days that are left to us I do not know when we are to consider the appropriations bills. There are several yet to be considered which must be acted on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that assignments of special days take precedence of special orders.

DESTITUTE FREEDMEN.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the resolution relating to the destitute condition of the women and children of freedmen in the District of Columbia, and moved that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask unanimous consent that Monday next, after the morning hour, shall be set apart for the consideration of territorial business.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I object.

REGULAR ORDER.

Mr. ALLEY. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CLERKSHIPS IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, ETC.

Mr. ALLEY. I move, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 389, relating to clerkships in the Post Office Department, and Senate bill No. 390, relating to postal laws, for reference to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

There was no objection; and the bills were severally taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH CHINA.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back Senate bill No. 407, to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEVENS. Does not that bill contain an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It is not an appropriation bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that it will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ALLEY. I have the floor, and I do not give way for such a motion.

Mr. Speaker, this is a question of vast importance to the American people, of vital interest to trade and commerce on the Pacific coast, and of considerable consequence to the whole world. This I trust I shall make apparent before the conclusion of my remarks.

This bill provides for the establishment of a line of steamers between California, China, and Japan, via the Sandwich Islands, to perform mail service between these several countries. The Postmaster General is directed to advertise for proposals at a sum not exceeding $500,000 per annum, to be given to the lowest bidder. This proposition has for its object not only increased mail facilities between our country and those I have mentioned, but another and greater purpose, to secure great commercial advantages by means of this direct and speedy communication between the western confines of our Republic and those oriental nations which have poured so lavishly into the lap of Europe the wealth of their products. With a line of steamers running weekly between those countries and San Francisco, and the Pacific railroad completed, we can direct and control in great degree the commerce of the world. This I trust and believe we shall see accomplished before many years. That will bring New York and China within twenty-six or twenty-seven days of each other, and London and China, via New York, inside of forty days of each other, as against over fifty now, between England and China. With our overland mails, as we have it now, and the line of steamers which this bill proposes established, New York would be some twelve or fifteen days nearer Hong Kong than London. We can then bring London nearer the East Indies than it is now by several days by this project. When the Pacific railroad is completed what will be the effect? It will not only be to give us vast control over the commerce of the globe, but will make the city of New York the greatest commercial city of the world. Then New York will be what London is now—the great settling point, where the exchanges of the whole world are adjusted.

It seems passing strange to me that our national legislators bestow so little thought and attention upon these great commercial questions which affect so vitally all the material interests of the country. Had we but a little of the sagacity of some other nations in developing all our resources, upon the ocean as well as the land, we should startle all Christendom with the magnitude of our achievements.

Let us glance for a moment at the sagacity and foresight of England and France in encouraging, protecting, and subsidizing ocean steam navigation. Great Britain early saw that the power and wealth of nations in this age were to be seriously affected through the agency of steam. She saw with prophetic eye that unless she availed herself of all the advantages to be derived from this new power her great commercial rival, the United States, would soon outstrip her in the profitable navigation of the ocean. The policy of England in encouraging by subsidies ocean steam navigation has extended her commerce and enriched her people to an extent that has astonished all the nations of the earth. The development of markets for her produce and manufactures by means of steam navigation has increased her power and added to her resources to an incalculable extent.

As early as 1837 Great Britain commenced the system of the mail steam packet service, which, then inaugurated, she has since pursued with sleepless vigilance and constantly-increasing development. In a memorial to Congress of last year of the New York Chamber of Commerce, which also contains a very able report of a committee of that board, are statistics and statements in reference to the British, French, and United States systems of steam navigation, which, so far as I have examined, I find entirely accurate, and which I will here give for the information of those gentlemen who may not have examined critically the memorial:

"The passages of the Sirius and Great Western in 1838, from Liverpool to New York, having plainly demonstrated the practicability of ocean steam navigation, the British Government at once undertook to explore the new field thus opened to her industry and enterprise.

"In the following year, 1839, a contract was made with Mr. Cunard to convey the mails from Liverpool via Halifax to Boston, in five steamers of the first class, for the sum of £85,000 or $425,000 per annum. It was stipulated that these vessels should be capable of conversion into ships-of-war and of carrying ordnance of the heaviest kind. This line of steamers, famous as the 'Cunard line,' was immediately established, and the result of the experiment was so favorable that the Government was, in 1846, induced to enlarge the contract of 1839 by adding four ships to run from Liverpool to New York, and to increase the compensation to £145,000 or $725,000 per annum for the total service. These last vessels commenced their trips in 1848. In 1845 the Government entered into a contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company for the employment of seven steamers at £160,000 to run from Southampton, via Gibraltar and Malta, to Alexandria, in Egypt, thence to send the mails overland to Suez, again thence by steamer to Singapore and Hong Kong, touching at Aden and Point de Galle, Ceylon, with a branch line from Point de Galle to Calcutta, touching at Madras. In the year 1840 a contract was made by the Admiralty with the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company at £240,000 or $1,200,000 per annum for fourteen steamers to carry the mails from Southampton to the West Indies, the ports of Mexico on the Gulf, and to New Orleans, Mobile, Savannah, and Charleston, to make twenty-four voyages or forty-eight trips a year, leaving Southampton semi-monthly.

"In consequence of some disasters during the first years, the West India line was relieved from touching at the ports of the United States, but in 1847 required to resume its trips to New Orleans and any others, as ordered.

"This company received a contract in 1850 of £270,000 per annum to carry the mails twice a month to the West Indies, and in 1851 a further contract of £25,000 to carry the mails once in each month to Brazil and the river Plate.

"The conditions of the contract required that the passages should be made in the following time:

	Days.	Hours.
To St. Thomas, in.....	14	12
To Colon, in.....	19	15
To Rio, in.....	26	6
From Rio, in.....	25	5
To Buenos Ayres, in.....	35	12
From Buenos Ayres, in.....	36	21

"From St. Thomas ten different radiating lines to Mexico, Central America, the Spanish Main, and the various West India islands, keep up a constant communication.

"These three lines employed in 1848 eighty-seven steamers, and for the home service twenty-eight smaller steamers, in all one hundred and fifteen steamships.

"In 1846 the Government made a contract with the Pacific Steam Navigation Company for a line from Valparaiso to Panama, touching at intermediate points, and making an overland connection with the West India line. A series of contracts were also entered into connecting the important commercial towns with the continent.

"In 1852 the Peninsular and Oriental Company and the Royal West India Mail Company alone employed fifty-three steamers, of which thirty were wooden vessels and twenty-three iron; of these sixteen run from Southampton to foreign ports, and twenty-three were permanently employed abroad. In 1854 Mr. Cunard received a contract to carry the mails from Halifax to Bermuda and St. Thomas, for £14,700.

"In 1857 the African Steamship Company took a contract of £33,000 to take the mails once a month to the Cape of Good Hope, and in 1858 to the west coast of Africa once a month, touching at Madeira, Teneriffe, Sierra Leone, and other intermediate points."

Nearly all the contracts to which allusion has here been made were made for a long period of time; and when application was made for renewal in most instances it was granted, and generally a long time before the expiration of the previous contract. In many cases an additional subsidy was granted when the interests of the country required and the continuance of the service imperatively demanded it. The British Government never hesitated to grant additional aid and extension of the system when it was made clearly to appear that it would develop new markets for their manufacturing products and commercial interests, although it has kept steadily in view the purpose to make it self-sustaining whenever possible. Such is their system of steam mail communication, so extended and profitable that an increase of existing service is contemplated on the China coast. But for the recent hostilities a line of steamships would probably ere this have been in progress of completion to run from China to Japan, and also to connect Brazil with Australia over the South Pacific ocean, and from Panama to British Columbia. May we not learn a lesson of wisdom from the example and experience of this ever-vigilant and powerful nation?

Again I quote from the memorial to which I have before alluded, in relation to the action of France:

"The French system of steam navigation is somewhat different from that of England. Under the reign of Napoleon III, France has again begun to develop her marine resources, and to recover something of the maritime power and colonial extension which she enjoyed until it was almost destroyed by the treaty of peace of 1815.

"To encourage the development of commerce, the Government pays enormous subsidies to the great lines which have been established to South America and the East. France, at least, does not intend to leave the control of the seas in the hands of one Power, and she has been gradually seizing such important points as had escaped the attention of Great Britain, or she has made points, unimportant in themselves, and at great labor and expense, secure ports of refuge to her commerce and of control over the great highways of the world. In the Mediterranean, Algeria off-sets Malta. In the Pacific, Otaheite, seized by Louis Philippe and placed under French protection, affords a station unsurpassed in the south Pacific; and she is fast acquiring and strengthening ports in the Indian and China seas, as well as on the African coast.

"All the French lines are in the hands of one company, the Messageries Impériales, under a large general subsidy from the Government, which is increased as any new service is added. This company is on a permanent and national footing. The Government makes the advances necessary to build the steamers, and gives an annual subsidy beside, and takes from the line an annual percentage of not exceeding five per cent., by which it repays itself gradually for the first advance. The Messageries employs three great lines, and a fourth is now contemplated; the first and oldest of these having been now over twenty years established in the Mediterranean line. This service is performed by two lines of steamers, one of which leaves each alternate week for Alexandria, and another for Constantinople, touching at the Italian and Greek ports, Malta, and the ports of Asia Minor. The other touches at the various ports on the coast of Africa, Tunis, Algiers, and Tangier. These vessels are all under the command of first lieutenants of the imperial navy, with the grade of captain.

"The East India service is performed by a monthly line of steamers which leave Marseilles and touch at Alexandria, thence to Aden, Point de Galle, and the bay of Saigon, and ends at Hong Kong. Connected with these are two branch lines, one from Hong Kong and Shanghai; a second is proposed from Aden to the Isle of Bourbon, a French possession. The main line has been in operation some years.

"There are two transatlantic lines which are in full operation. The first runs from Bordeaux twice a month to Brazil and La Plata, and has been in operation some five or six years. The second is to Mexico, touching at Santiago de Cuba, on the island of Cuba, and at Martinique. This line leaves St. Nazaire and ends at Vera Cruz; a branch line connects Martinique with Guadalupe. The main Mexican line has been in operation since the French occupation of Vera Cruz, and will shortly run semi-monthly."

The establishment and conduct of our American lines of ocean steamers—although receiving but little aid or encouragement from the Government—has exhibited an enterprise, energy, and sagacity unsurpassed in the history of commercial effort.

The Collins line of steamers this Government subsidized in 1850. It was established late in that year. In the brief period of its existence it challenged the admiration and received the support of the whole American public. It seemed also to be in greater favor with Europeans than the Cunard line. The vessels were more splendid, of much greater speed, and commanded by distinguished and able commanders. The line was unfortunate and short-lived. Two of their finest steamers, the Arctic and Pacific, were lost; the first in September, 1854, and the last sailed from Liverpool in January, 1856, and was never heard of again. The other three magnificent steamers were sold to satisfy the creditors of the company. It was conceded by all that this line was vastly superior in every respect to the English steamers. The establishment of this line had the effect to increase the speed and induce better accommodations from the Cunard line; reducing the average time of their passages about thirty hours; but even at this the American steamers beat their English rivals a day and a half in their average voyages.

The Havre line was quite successful, and continued to run until the breaking out of the rebellion, since which time their steamships have been employed mostly as Government transports. This line received but small assistance from the Government.

The Bremen line was the first established. Its contract with the Government expired in 1858, and the aid from the Government was so small that the owners abandoned the service.

The Pacific line is justly regarded with admiration and pride by all American citizens. It has been wonderfully successful, but not by Government favor. The aid rendered by Government was insufficient to enable it to continue, but the opportune discovery of the gold mines in California gave such an impetus to emigration and trade upon the Pacific coast, that from that time it met with eminent and unexampled success.

The line from Charleston to Havana was subsidized for several years, and was in successful prosecution when the rebellion broke out. This line the South was always very earnest to subsidize, for it ran from a southern port to a slave-holding West India port, and was owned by the "chivalry."

There have been a great many coast lines established, and most of them eminently successful. With a fair chance, American enterprise, skill, and energy, could always outstrip that of all other nations in a contest for maritime supremacy; but the American shipping merchant has not received that fostering care of the Government that those living in other countries have been blessed with. England has done more to encourage commerce than all other Governments combined. Now, the question arises, how much has Great Britain increased her commerce and trade by the adoption of this policy? This I am able to show by a comparison of her trade with those countries that she has opened steam communication with, at the time it was opened with what it is now, and also in comparing the trade of the United States with some of those countries, with what it was then and what it is at the present time, showing a vast increase on the part of Great Britain and a corresponding decrease on the part of the United States. As shown by the statistics which I have presented, England grants subsidies to the enormous amount of upwards of $4,000,000 in gold. She is partially reimbursed for this vast outlay by postal receipts to the amount of about $1,700,000, leaving a clear loss of about $2,500,000. The exports of British products to the United States were in 1800 about the same as they were in 1840, when the Cunard steamers commenced running. They were in 1800, $29,500,000; in 1840, $29,300,000, a trifle less than in 1800. Since the establishment of this Cunard line and its continuance by subsidy, Great Britain has been increasing her trade with the United States with unexampled rapidity—more than quadrupling it in a few years. Subsidized mail steamship communication from England to the west coast of Africa commenced in 1852, and the exports of her products and manufactures nearly doubled the first year. In 1852 the exports were $2,800,000; in 1855, less than three years after the line had been established, they were $6,400,000, and have been gradually increasing since. Her exports and trade with China, India, and Egypt, show a much larger increase since the establishment of mail steam packet service than that I have before given. The exports of British products to China in 1842, only a little more than two years before mail steam service was commenced, were something less than $5,000,000. In 1856, fourteen years afterward, they were over $11,000,000. The exports of British products to Egypt were $1,105,000 in 1842; and in 1856 they were nearly $3,000,000. The exports to India in 1842 were less than $26,000,000, and in 1856 were more than $52,000,000.

In 1859 the whole amount of imports into Mexico, from the best information I am able to obtain, was about $26,000,000, and the exports about $28,000,000, making of imports and exports a foreign interchange of $54,000,000. Of this commerce, England secured to herself about $33,000,000, more than one half of the whole. The United States obtained about $8,000,000; France something over $5,000,000, and the balance was distributed pretty equally among some six or seven other countries. England thus obtained the lion's share—more than four times as much as the United States, notwithstanding Mexico was our neighbor, and by all the laws governing trade we should have monopolized the largest half of this rich commerce. The loss of it to ourselves is only ascribable to our own folly, and want of commercial sagacity on the part of our rulers. In 1835 the trade between the United States and Mexico was more than double what it is now. From that time to the present our commerce with Mexico has been continually declining, while that of Great Britain has been continually increasing. I think I have adduced examples sufficient to show the wisdom of that policy which England has so persistently pursued for so many years; but there are other cases which prove in still greater degree her wisdom and sagacity. In 1851 she subsidized a line of mail steamers to Brazil, and the first year after they commenced running she increased her exports over $5,000,000, and in six years she more than doubled her trade with Brazil. Yet for a great many years previous to 1851 her trade with that country remained almost stationary, increasing in eight years only about six per cent. Our exports to Brazil during this same period of time amounted on an average, I believe, to about $4,500,000. In 1859 our exports to Brazil were about $6,000,000, and in 1860 a trifle less than that amount. Our imports in 1859 from Brazil were $22,000,000, and in 1860 about $21,000,000. This shows a large balance of trade against us—indicating an indifference to our commercial interests which is unpardonable. Contrast this with Great Britain. Her exports to Brazil in 1861 were over $28,000,000, and her imports of Brazilian products—exclusive of coin—less than $14,000,000, making a balance of trade largely in her favor. This is a kind of commercial intercourse which replenishes the coffers of Great Britain, but sadly impoverishes us.

I have already given you the report of the subsidies of France, and the result in benefit to her commerce and prosperity differs only in extent with that of England. In proportion as she has subsidized have her commercial prosperity and intercourse increased with those countries that she has connecting ocean steam service with. France increased her steamers in ten years from 117 to 324, and her steamer tonnage from 12,000 to 66,000.

In the statistics and statements which I have presented, I think I have given some of the reasons and furnished something of argument in favor of the general policy of encouraging increased facilities for postal and commercial purposes by the establishment of ocean mail steamship lines, when practicable, to communicate with every portion of the globe.

Having said thus much, Mr. Speaker, in general terms chiefly, in favor of this system of ocean steam navigation, permit me to say in addition to what I have already said, something more in favor of this line in particular which this bill proposes to inaugurate. Establish this line of steamers to China and Japan, and the same ratio of increase in trade with those countries that England experienced after she subsidized a line of steamers to China and Egypt, and the additional receipts from customs, the first year, under our present tariff, would more than pay the deficiency in covering the expense from postal returns. Then, again, we should do about all the postal service of Europe for the East Indies when our Pacific railroad is completed. This, with our own, would not leave a very large deficiency to be paid outside of the postal income. This, I think, we may safely count upon, for our facilities for reaching all parts of the East Indies would enable us to save several days in time over the Mediterranean route for most European correspondence.

If we establish this line of steamers and build the Pacific railroad, we shall not only do nearly all the postal service of Europe for that distant oriental region, but we should have about all the carrying trade for passengers and high-cost merchandise. A large portion of the products of India are of high cost and light weight, and most goods of that description can be transported to Europe by steam and across our continent cheaper than by sailing vessel, if you take into account the difference of interest and insurance, and every merchant regards these as elements of cost just as much as freight. Take silks and teas, for instance. The difference between sending them to Europe by sail, consuming four or five months' time, and that of sending them by steam, would make a cost on those articles in the items of insurance and interest of several cents a pound. This alone secures advantages which must inevitably, upon those articles, give us the carrying trade of the world.

Some object to this additional pecuniary burden at this time because the Government needs all its resources at the present moment to enable it to prosecute successfully the gigantic war in which we are now engaged. Far be it from me to add anything of burden to the Treasury which can well be avoided. I have been one of those who have feared much more for the last two years that the Treasury would give out than that our armies would be unsuccessful in the field. I have constantly, in season and out of season, advocated, as measures of relief to this Department of the Government, retrenchment and economy, increased taxation, and reduction of the volume of the currency; and if I did not sincerely believe that the effect of this measure will be, in the end, rather to replenish than exhaust the Treasury, I would not advocate it now. But I trust and believe we shall be all through our troubles long before this money will be called for, which cannot be for some years yet.

This controversy about subsidizing ocean mail steam service, which has existed for many years, has engaged the attention of statesmen, of the press, and the public in Europe and America, for many years, and always with growing favor everywhere but here—the nation of all others that should foster and encourage it in the manner which this bill provides. Much prejudice has arisen against direct subsidies, as they were thought to have been obtained here in some instances by favoritism and corruption. But this bill provides, as did the Brazilian bill of last session, that it shall be thrown open to free competition, and given to the lowest bidder. Hence you see no lobbyists around trying to push it through. This is the only way in which I would give national aid to these great and beneficent projects.

The chief cause, however, of the withdrawal of Government aid to ocean steam navigation was to be found principally in the jealousy and consequent opposition of the South. Some of her statesmen openly declared that it was nothing but robbery of the South for the benefit of the North. Well, indeed, does the New York Board of Trade remark:

"The day has passed, and passed forever, when an American will look with jealousy on the fostering or development of any branch of the industry of the country, whether agricultural, commercial, or mechanical. Yet nothing is more certain than that men were found (and this was nothing as compared with their later crime) who were ready to destroy the commercial supremacy of this nation, and to strip it of its right arm of offense by crippling its marine, that it might be the more powerless to resist their then premeditated treason. Unfortunately their counsels prevailed, and the ocean steamers in which the country took such a hearty and honest pride are among the memories of the past."

In some remarks which I had the honor to make in this House at the last session, I said, what I repeat now, if it can be shown that in those countries where ocean steam communication has been fostered, encouraged, and lines established, the trade and commerce of the countries to which such postal and commercial facilities have been extended have been enormously increased, while our own has been as constantly diminishing with all nations that Great Britain and France have established such lines of communication with, we cannot fail to perceive that such increase on their part and diminution on ours is directly ascribable to that policy, so wise and sagacious, which England has pursued so steadily upon such a prodigious scale for so many years. If it is also discovered that this steam communication is and can be maintained only by governmental aid, at the cost of Government subsidies, then it is the duty of this Government to encourage, protect, and extend commerce, to some degree at least, by similar means.

There are grave political considerations which may well be considered in connection with this policy. I suppose all will admit that it is of the last importance that the most amicable relations should exist between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. I think I may safely say that it has been the wise policy of this Government ever since the admission of California into the Union to strengthen the commerce of the Pacific and promote their interests in every feasible manner. It was in this spirit that the telegraph line was established to California by Government subsidy; and with this view the Pacific railroad was encouraged, aided, and pushed through. Strong objection and strenuous opposition were made to granting Government aid to that telegraph line, which could not have been built without such aid. It was my privilege, as it was my cheerful pleasure, to aid by my voice and vote in committee and upon this floor the passage of that telegraph act. The wisdom of our course was most fully vindicated by the transmission of a single message by the Government, and one also of the very first sent, which saved to the Government nearly double the amount of a whole year's subsidy.

I trust that this measure will be adopted. It will be regarded by the commercial world as the premonition of a disposition to recognize the claims and appreciate the benefits of a growing commerce, which, if properly fostered, will soon give us maritime supremacy upon every sea. I hope ere long to see a system of ocean steam navigation developed surpassing England in still greater degree than she now excels us. Accomplish this, and we become at once the greatest maritime Power on earth. We should present to the world the sublime spectacle of a mighty nation just emerging from an almost death-struggle for the preservation of our nationality, dearer to us than life, turning aside, with its flag flying from the mast-head of its steamers upon every sea, to dispute for ocean supremacy with the great Powers of Europe and wresting from their grasp the carrying trade of the world.

Then, unparalleled as has been the success of our oceanic career in the past, doubly glorious would it be in the future.

I now yield the floor to the gentleman from California, [Mr. COLE,] my colleague on the committee, who first introduced this measure, and who has been unwearied in his exertions to get it through.

Mr. COLE, of California. Mr. Speaker, the population of the Chinese empire, according to the best geographers, is a little over four hundred and fifty million, of Japan sixty million. The two contain nearly half the population of the globe. They are separated from the United States by the Pacific ocean, and the distance across to Japan is four thousand seven hundred miles, to China less than six thousand miles. They are in the same latitude with California, and their principal ports face San Francisco. They are not accessible to any other civilized country without crossing the equator and going a much greater distance. China is within twenty-five days by steam of America, and Japan can be easily reached in twenty days. The distance from London or Paris to Hong Kong, all the way by water, is sixteen thousand miles, by Suez it is twelve thousand miles, and it takes full fifty-two days to make the journey under the most favorable auspices. The longitude of the Chinese and Japanese ports is about opposite to that of the Atlantic ports of America, so that if one could travel on a direct line it would make but little difference whether, in going from New York to Shanghai or Kanagawa an easterly or westerly course was pursued. But the passage eastward can never be direct. A great detour will always have to be made around the south of Asia, or a greater still around Africa, while the westward course is on the same general line over our own country and the Pacific. New York is about three thousand miles nearer to China, by the westward route than is London by the Isthmus of Suez. When the Pacific railroad shall be completed, New York and Philadelphia will have full ten days, advantage over London and Paris in their communication with China and Japan. Then New York, or perhaps San Francisco, must become the settling place for the commerce of those vast oriental empires, an advantage which London has exclusively enjoyed for many years. England has taken the lead of nations in the East India trade. She has been able to do this in consequence of early possessing a larger marine, and of being located in reference to that trade as favorably as any of her competitors heretofore. But our settlement of the western coast of America, and the rapid filling up of the space between here and that coast with population, is giving the United States an advantage which, if improved as it should be, neither Great Britain nor any other nation can longer resist. This advantage is developing itself rapidly, and if taken at its flood will inevitably lead to national fortune.

There are now in the Pacific States fifty thousand natives of China, engaged in all the various industrial pursuits. The liberality of our republican Government has unlocked the rusty gates of the Celestial Empire. In San Francisco are above twenty large Chinese importing houses, owned and conducted altogether by Chinese merchants, who pay very large revenue to the Government, and who manifest an intelligence and integrity in the management of their business highly creditable to their calling. That distrust which these singular people have ever felt toward the "outside world" is fast wearing away, at least so far as the Americans are concerned, and all that is lacking to give us control of their vast commerce is steamship communication between San Francisco and their ports. And the same is true of the Japanese, whose sentiments toward us are much more friendly than toward any other people with whom they are having intercourse. The trade of China has enriched every nation that has enjoyed it, and besides it is capable of indefinite expansion. Five hundred million people, distinguished for industry and general education, must of necessity produce an unlimited quantity of valuable commodities. Their products are by no means confined to tea, sugar, rice, cotton, and silks, but comprise everything that ingenuity can invent or want suggest. In the perfection of many of their manufactures they excel all other people.

Our commerce with China has been rapidly increasing ever since her ports were first opened to all nations. In the fiscal year 1862-63, the value of the imports from that country was $10,961,064, an amount which was only exceeded by the imports from three other countries, namely, England, Cuba, and Canada. Our exports to China in the same year amounted to considerably over that sum. We sent from San Francisco to China in 1863, $4,206,370 in treasure, beside a large sum in the aggregate in private hands. In the same year California shipped to China 2,709,733 feet of lumber, 9,330 tons of wheat, 6,370 tons of flour, 450 tons of bread, 8,880 flasks of quicksilver, and a large quantity, as well as great variety, of other products of the Pacific coast.

The amount of our exchanges with China grew from $14,310,702 in 1853 to $22,472,715 in 1860, the year before the war, and has doubtless been increasing slowly ever since, notwithstanding the obstacles thrown in its way by the rebellion.

The San Francisco Mercantile Gazette remarks:

"The people of that country, who have lived among us these many years, have done us a great service in teaching their countrymen at home the use and value of our products, and in overcoming their ancient prejudices against 'barbarian' diet. That trade once fairly inaugurated, as indeed it now seems to be, the wants of a population almost illimitable give assurance of a market for any surplus we may have to spare at prices reasonably remunerative."

But our trade compared with that of Great Britain with the same country is small. In 1853 the value of the exchanges between England and China was $50,026,060, and in 1860, $73,209,000. It will be observed that the percentage of increase as exhibited for the years mentioned is greater in the American than in the British trade, which must be attributable to our proximity, and friendly intercourse with the Chinese; for England has had an advantage over us in all other respects, and particularly in having communication by steam vessels between her East India possessions and that country.

The tonnage of vessels arriving in American ports from China has sprung up from 19,243 tons in 1846, before the acquisition of California, to 68,519 tons in 1863. It would have been much greater but for the danger of piratical cruisers, too often, I regret to say, fitted out in British ports. In fact it was larger in 1860 than at present, it being then 81,467 tons. At the usual rate of progression it should have been in 1864 more than a hundred thousand tons.

In alluding to Great Britain, I disclaim any purpose to excite ill feeling toward that country. The English and Americans are natural allies. They are one in blood, in language, in history, religion, and traditions, and ought heartily to deprecate any feelings toward each other beyond those of generous rivalry, as between prosperous members of the same great family. The advantage which the English have obtained over us in commerce is altogether fair, it being the legitimate result of a more sagacious policy. Let it rather excite our emulation than our jealousy.

Of course but a limited portion of the commerce between the United States and China is transacted at San Francisco. Most of it comes to New York and other Atlantic ports, and whatever measures may be adopted to stimulate that trade will benefit the whole country alike. California constitutes but a small fraction of the market for East India products. The great point to be gained is to outstrip other countries in the speed of communications. In commerce time is everything. To illustrate, it is only necessary to suppose that the market of Canton, or any other place, becomes bare of an article of merchandise which both London and New York can supply. If the New York merchant can ascertain the fact first he can put his cargo afloat and meet the demand in advance of his London competitor, and as a consequence will realize a profit; while he who comes later, finding a full market, will lose. Great Britain has practiced upon this simple theory to the detriment of other Governments. She has established steamship communication wherever it has been needed to give her the advantage in time. She has subsidized numerous lines of steamships, and never hesitates to aid them when by so doing she can reach a market, new or old, in advance of other nations. She but lately paid, and probably still pays, for mail steamship service over $5,000,000 annually, and for every dollar thus expended she realizes many in return.

First, she receives back in postages considerably more than half her outlay, or nearly three million dollars, but her great source of gain by this wise liberality is in the wonderful increase of commerce which always follows her support of these enterprises. At one time the United States Government set out in pursuit of this same policy, and in the year 1857 she paid for mail steamship service $1,329,733. But she seems to have grown weary in well-doing, notwithstanding the receipts for postage for that service the same year amounted to $1,035,740, or about three fourths of the total expenses. Our practice in this direction should have been increased, but instead of that it has been dwindling away until we are now paying $160,000 for carrying the paper mail to California, and not a dime to any steamship for carrying the mails to any foreign country whatever. To be sure a small subsidy was offered at the last session of Congress for steam-carriage of the mails to Brazil, but it has not yet gone into operation. The system has been a partial failure in America because of the lack of liberality on the part of our Government. While the British have paid at the rate of $2 39 per mile of distance run by her steamships for such service the Americans have paid only $1 80½ per mile. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the American system has almost died out, while the smoke of British steamers is seen curling among all the islands of the ocean like pillars of cloud by day and of fire by night, lighting commerce on its way.

This policy, so nobly inaugurated in America in 1846, and successfully pursued for several years, has been choked down by the narrow economy of our quondam southern rulers, whose jealousy of northern commerce led them to conspire for its destruction.

It is worth while to remark in this connection that on an equal footing the American marine can successfully compete with the whole world; but the advantage which the more sagacious British Government has bestowed upon her merchantmen cannot be overcome, even by the greater architectural skill of our ship-builders. This will be made the more apparent by reference to the changes in commerce which has attended or followed the establishment of steamship communication with different countries.

Our intercourse with the West India islands by means of steam has been for the last dozen years somewhat like that of Great Britain, and as a consequence our commerce there has grown from $39,104,648 in 1853, to $66,567,291 in 1860, while the British, which was $48,494,000 in 1853, only increased to $61,844,195 in 1860. In Cuba, where our steam communication was best established, our exchanges went up from $24,873,714 in 1853, to $46,428,434 in 1861, and this in the face of an almost prohibitory duty on flour, our chief export to that island. The British exchanges in the same period remained about stationary.

The trade with Brazil, where the British alone have had steam communication, presents another striking illustration of the fact in hand. In 1851 the balance of trade with that kingdom was against us by the sum of $8,396,348, and in 1860 it was against us to the amount of $15,269,568; while on the other hand it was in favor of Great Britain in 1851 by $3,124,665, and in 1860 by $10,887,980. The advantage of mail steamship service, by which British merchants could sooner learn and quicker supply the wants of the Brazilians, presents a clear solution of this great change in the tide of commerce.

A like result, but even more conspicuous, appears in the case of the Argentine Republic and Uruguay, to which the same line of British steamships extends. The total amount of exchanges between those countries and the United Kingdom in 1853 was $11,789,150, and in 1860, $23,351,315, showing an increase of nearly one hundred per cent. in seven years. The total of exchanges between those same countries and the United States for the year 1853 was $3,404,564, and for the year 1860, $2,915,366, showing a decline in the same seven years of nearly half a million dollars.

For a further illustration of the advantages of steam communication, let reference be made to Chili and Peru, where the ships of the Pacific Steam Navigation Company of Great Britain have been regularly running. The exchanges between Great Britain and those republics in 1853 amounted to $22,913,725, and in 1860 to $41,257,580, or nearly double. The exchanges of the United States with them in 1853 were, in value, but $5,202,329, and in 1860 only $6,096,370—the United States barely holding her own by the aid of her regular steam communication as far as the Isthmus of Panama, without which England would most certainly have added to her large sum the little balance that remained to us. Great Britain has subsidized and established splendid lines of steamers to both coasts of South America, and, as a consequence, she has control of exchanges there amounting to at least $150,000,000 a year, a great part of which legitimately belongs to the United States, but which the unwise policy of our traitor rulers of former years permitted to be turned into the markets of another Government, and to replenish its coffers. The sooner we reform this policy the better it will be for us as a nation, and it is no excuse to say that we are in debt. The British Government was also in debt, and deeper than we are; but she resorted to these measures to relieve herself from public burdens, and the result shows the wisdom of her course. These subsidies, so called, are not gratuities, they are most profitable investments; nor are they like bread cast upon the waters, to be gathered after many days; they are remunerative from the beginning, and pay many fold in duties to the Government, to say nothing about the postages, which in some cases exceed the whole amount of expenditures.

As further and more incontestable proof of the ability of the American marine to compete successfully with that of Great Britain and of course of any other nation, I will refer to New Granada, with which both England and the United States have had constant and regular communication by steam for about the same period. The American exchanges with that country have grown up from $1,409,998 in 1853, to $6,042,226 in 1861; while the British, in the same period, have only advanced from $3,363,490 in 1853, to $6,352,430 in 1861. The American trade has increased more than fourfold, the British trade has not doubled.

In the same series of years, though the British steamship communication with the West Indies has been much more perfect than our own, our commerce with those islands has increased forty per cent., while the British has increased only twenty-five per cent.

It is to be regretted there are not more instances of fair competition between foreign and American merchants to enable us to lengthen out this proud record.

It is attributable mainly to her ever-expanding system of steam navigation that the exchanges of Great Britain were greater in 1860 by $626,371,790 than in 1853, and to a decline in the American system that ours had increased by only $263,333,746 in the same period.

But it is in the East Indies that the growth of British commerce has been most remarkable. There she has sown largely, and the harvest is great. Four years ago she had upward of fifty ocean steamers, many of the first class, plying in those waters and in connection with that trade, all of which were aided by liberal Government subsidies. The result is that she not only controls the commerce of all that portion of the globe, but she actually owns Hindostan, with a population of one hundred and eighty million souls. She also owns Australasia, a large share of Polynesia, and, possessing Penang, Singapore, and Labuan, exercises undoubted sway over the Malay Archipelago, with all its boundless resources. She is now looking toward commercial dominion in China and Japan, and unless the United States, which is the only Power on earth capable of competing with her for the trade of those countries, adopts a new policy toward them, it will not be long before they too, like Hindostan, will be at the feet of the British lion. To suffer this, with the advantages we have of good neighborhood and friendly intercourse already established, would be a national disgrace, and ought to cause every American to shrink with shame.

Enough has been said to show that wherever either the United Kingdom or the United States has opened steam communication with a country, there has immediately followed a rapid increase of trade with that country. It also appears that wherever the American and British merchants have been afforded equal commercial facilities, the American merchant has demonstrated his ability to outstrip his British competitors; and it is only the advantage of subsidized steamship service, so freely tendered by the British Government, that has enabled her merchants to crowd competition out of many of the richest markets of the world.

The proposition now is to authorize the Postmaster General to advertise for bids to carry the mails monthly between San Francisco and China and Japan, touching at the Sandwich Islands, at a cost not exceeding $500,000 per annum. It is not presumed that the postages will reimburse the Government for this outlay, though they will doubtless cover a large share of the amount bid; but it is as certain a demonstration can make any fact, that the expenditure will be returned several fold in duties on increased importations, and that, too, from the very start. And then the trade will increase from year to year, almost with arithmetical progression, until not only our own expanding Republic, but the whole world, will be supplied through American merchants with the products of the land of Confucius.

The Chinese are an intelligent people, they are an educated people. Every man among them can read and write with facility in his own language. Of the many thousands in California, nearly all have acquired some portion of the American language, and not a few of them can speak and write it with fluency. They place so just an estimate upon the value of education that they have established schools for the instruction of their young in San Francisco. "Outside barbarians" are accustomed to call them heathens; but it is an open question whether that people is really lacking in enlightenment who possessed a knowledge of many of the arts and sciences and useful inventions long before Europe emerged from the gloom of the dark ages. Besides, it would not seem very likely that a people who have been able to maintain a Government longer by many centuries than any other, and to grow more numerous by hundreds of millions, are wanting in civilization.

The Chinese and Japanese alike are remarkable for their ingenuity and industry, both of which contribute to the value and extent of their productions. They have little of the dash and none of the recklessness of Americans, but possess in an eminent degree many of the more sober and solid virtues of our race. Their commerce is worth untold millions. It is the richest prize ever placed before a nation. It is within our reach, and the question to be determined is, have we the wisdom to grasp it?

The difficulties in the way of our competing with England for this valuable boon are becoming greater and greater by reason of events which have sprung incidentally out of the present war. Great Britain has been compelled to look elsewhere than in America for cotton, and in China she finds this useful staple. During the first nine months of the year 1863 she obtained there 23,392,993 pounds, and during the first nine months of 1864 she obtained from the same source the much greater amount of 63,989,184 pounds, or nearly three times the quantity only one year later. This shows the necessity for vigilance and activity on our part, lest Great Britain obtain too far the start of us.

Objection is made to this measure, because, as is alleged, the present condition of the finances forbids that we should incur any liability beyond what is absolutely necessary to suppress the rebellion; and this is the only argument against it that seems to have any force whatever. But to this it is replied that in no event will the aid be required before the year 1868, and by that time it is hoped we will be relieved both from the rebellion and the financial embarrassment growing out of it. This service to China will require three large ships of four thousand tons burden each, all of which will have to be built expressly for that trade, and it would be hardly possible to put them on the line sooner than 1867, the time required by the bill. Thus the point of this objection is broken, and it is difficult to find a reason why we should not make the most of our time in regaining what we have lost by delay.

The principal point in the Chinese empire where the proposed line will probably run is the city of Shanghai, or some place near there, at the mouth of the great Yang-tse river. That city is almost a thousand miles nearer to the United States than is Hong Kong, and there is already steam communication between the two. Near the mouth of the Yang-tse the grand Suchau canal finds its way to the ocean and pours forth its rich freights of silks and teas gathered in and brought down hundreds of miles from Peking and the north.

The Yang-tse is one of the largest rivers in the world, it being scarcely less in length and volume than our own Father of Waters. It drains all the central and richest portions of that great empire. On its fertile margins are scores, if not hundreds, of large cities, among them Nankin, Nganking, and Wuchang, which number their population by millions. Upon this river, which, like the Mississippi, is navigable for thousands of miles, are now plying several steamboats sent out within the last few years by Americans.

The way, therefore, is already prepared, and it only requires the putting forth of a little exertion to gather the harvest. From the first settlement of California many circumstances seem to have combined to favor the establishment of this line of steam-vessels. And the people of America should not lag behind the monarchies of the Old World in taking hold of these powerful agencies of wealth and civilization. This project is next in grandeur to that which makes our country free. It will bring San Francisco in close neighborhood with the East Indies; and when the Pacific railway is completed New York and the eastern coast will be but little further away. Then these two great sister cities of America, the one sitting on the Atlantic looking eastward, and the other on the Pacific looking westward, will control the commerce of the globe. Then ancient civilizations will succumb to the modern, monarchy to republicanism, and the Old World to the New.

I now demand the previous question, and hope that the bill will pass without a dissenting voice.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ANCONA demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 77, noes 19.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. COLE, of California, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 392) supplemental to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads;" and

An act (S. No. 403) to establish a bridge across the Ohio river at Cincinnati, Ohio, a post road.

An act (H. R. No. 705) for the relief of collectors and surveyors of customs in certain cases.

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS IN MINNESOTA.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the bill reported back by Mr. ALLEY, but was interrupted by—

Mr. WINDOM, who inquired if the morning hour had expired.

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. WINDOM. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to call up the privileged motion I made the other day to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 761 was ordered to be engrossed.

The SPEAKER. After the expiration of the morning hour the gentleman has a right to call up a privileged motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to postpone it until after we get through with the tax bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. I call up the motion, and upon it demand the previous question.

The bill was reported by the Clerk by its title, as follows: "An act extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes."

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the House refused to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Being engrossed, the bill was read the third time.

Mr. WINDOM. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN. On ordering the main question I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN and WINDOM were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 30.

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ALLISON and DAWSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-five, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 43, not voting 56; as follows:

During the roll-call,

Mr. GOOCH stated that Mr. Urson was detained from the House by indisposition in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

LAND-GRANT ROADS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. L. MYERS. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House yesterday rejected bill of the House No. 710; and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The motion can only be entered at this time, the gentleman from Vermont having the floor.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. What bill is it?

The SPEAKER. The bill which was rejected yesterday.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I would ask if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. L. MYERS] voted on the prevailing side.

The SPEAKER. The motion will not be entered unless the gentleman voted on the prevailing side. The recollection of the Chair is that the gentleman did so vote. The Chair is informed that he did, and the motion will be entered.

Mr. MORRILL. I will now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

MUSTERING OUT OF TROOPS.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution to provide for the mustering out of the military service certain non-commissioned officers and privates who enlisted to fill old regiments; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that in every case where any regiment, battalion, or company has been mustered out of the service of the United States by reason of the expiration of the term for which such organization had been accepted, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to cause immediately to be mustered out all those non-commissioned officers and privates who, during the years 1862 and 1863, were enlisted with the understanding that they were to serve only for the unexpired term of any such organization; and in cases where such regiments, battalions, and companies have not yet been mustered out, he shall cause to be mustered out the non-commissioned officers and privates above described whenever the term of such organization shall expire; provided, that before any such enlisted man shall be mustered out, he shall sign a statement, under oath, that he enlisted with the distinct assurance and understanding that he engaged to serve only for the unexpired term of the organization into which he was mustered, such statement to be verified by the recruiting officer by whom he was enlisted or by some commissioned officer having actual and personal knowledge of the facts in the case.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The report accompanying the joint resolution was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WEBSTER. I do not rise to oppose the passage of the joint resolution, but I want information about it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to debate.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I will yield once more for a moment to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. KING.]

MILITARY DEBT OF MISSOURI.

Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the constitutional convention of the State of Missouri in regard to the military debt of that State; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

TAX BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I now insist on my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the tax bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee was last in session the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] proposed an amendment to come in at the end of line six hundred and ten, on page 26; pending that, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] moved an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] proposed to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That banks incorporated under State authority, with a capital of less than fifty thousand dollars, whose circulating notes are secured wholly by the deposit of bonds of the United States at their par value, to the amount of ten per cent. beyond the amount of their circulating notes, shall be taxed upon their circulation and deposits in the same manner and at the same rates as are or may be prescribed for the taxation of national banks.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa by striking out the words "April, 1865," and inserting "January, 1866."

Mr. WILSON. I propose to modify my substitute by striking out "April" and inserting "July."

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Then I move to strike out "July, 1865," and insert "January, 1866." I wish to say a word in respect to this amendment. The proposition of the gentleman from Iowa is that no bank or banking association shall issue any notes of any of the State banks or

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 53.

banking associations after the 1st of July, 1865. It strikes me that that is a very short notice to give to the State banks to withdraw all their circulation. It will cause embarrassment to the banks themselves, and embarrassment to the business of the country. In the State of New York the Comptroller of the national currency has for a long time declined the applications for national banks on the ground that he was holding back the charters for New York till the State banks shall see fit to come in under the national system. I hold that if the State banks are required to withdraw all their circulation in July next, they will not have time to come in under the national system.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the gentleman that the effect of my amendment is to prevent these banks only from reissuing that which may be brought in. It does not provide that these banks shall retire their circulation, but that their notes, when paid in, shall be returned to them and not reissued.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The circulation will be driven into the banks for redemption and cannot be reissued. In the State of New York fully three fourths of the circulation is that of the State banks; and if that circulation be retired so soon, and before the banks have time to get the national currency, the banks themselves and the business of the State and country will be much embarrassed. I am not denying that the State banks (although I believe them to be sound and good institutions) have to yield to that public opinion which demands a national currency; but I submit that we should give them all reasonable time. Heavy taxes have been imposed upon them which will oblige them to come under the national system. I am not finding any particular fault with that. I have thought, however, that the best way was to induce them by the advantages held out to them to come in. I admit that they have got to yield. All that I object to is the summary process, which I regard as unnecessary.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise, Mr. Chairman, to oppose this whole system of blotting out State banks. The idea is that we are to curtail the currency. But since this national bank system has been created we have already established seven hundred and eighty-one banks, with an aggregate capital of $181,000,000, and a circulation of $90,500,000—with twice or thrice that amount in deposits—so that the actual, practical circulation of these banks at this moment is close to $250,000,000. Instead of curtailing the currency we are expanding it more and more. And no matter what our victories are, no matter what the legislation here or elsewhere may be, so long as this system goes on the price of gold must keep up.

I have not time within five minutes to dwell on this subject. It would require five weeks to discuss properly such a subject as this. Blotting out State banks! What right have we to blot out State banks? They were born before this Government was born. They carried us—one of them, at least—through the Revolution, and established the credit and character of the country. We have blotted out the State militia. We have blotted out State courts wherever the Federal Government supposed itself to be in any way concerned. We have blotted out the system of State taxation by absorbing in the Federal Government almost the whole power of taxation. We are now called upon to blot out the whole system of State railroads, bringing them into this body, and making of Congress nothing but a State Legislature or a mere town corporation.

Sir, it may be of little use to talk. But I enter these remarks as a warning of what we are coming to in this matter of national bank circulation. It is a fraud upon the public to say that we are curtailing the currency. The whole idea is fraudulent from beginning to end. We are expanding it throughout, and are to go on more and more expanding until the whole system of $300,000,000 of capital of national banks is established, with a capacity of expansion, as I showed last session, of nearly nine hundred million dollars more.

Now, no matter what victories we may gain; no matter what the State banks may do; no matter what may be the laws, so long as you allow the banks to go on expanding the currency, certain it is that prices of everything are to be kept up, and the country is to be mulcted with this mere paper currency.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. DONNELLY to the amendment of Mr. HOOPER; and it was rejected.

Mr. DAWES. I propose to amend the substitute by striking out "five" and inserting "seven."

The CHAIRMAN. There is already an amendment pending to the substitute.

Mr. DAWES. Then I will move to amend the original amendment, so that it will read "so long as such circulation shall exceed seven per cent. of the capital," &c. That will answer the same purpose.

I am, with the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Wilson], one of those who did not vote for the establishment of this national banking system. I am also, with him, one of those who see clearly that that system must be accepted by the people and by the State banks as the established order of things; and I am, with him, disposed, in the best possible way, to hasten the time when there shall be throughout the country but one system of currency, and that the national banking system. I did not see, any more than he did, the necessity at that time of displacing the old established order of things with this new one. But that is past.

I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] to propose, by his amendment, not so much to destroy the remaining State banks as to cure an existing and acknowledged evil, the smaller currency of the country. But I think it does not meet that evil and will not accomplish that end. I agree that if it goes into force it will extinguish the remainder of the State banks. But in my opinion it will have no appreciable effect upon the condition of the currency. Why, sir, there does not exist at the present time of the State bank currency but about one hundred million dollars. At the time of the establishment of the national banking system there was but about one hundred and seventy million dollars of currency from State banks. It is now reduced to about one hundred million dollars. Yet during all this time, while we have been ascribing to the State banks the evils which we have brought about by our own legislation, during the very time we have been attempting to contract the currency by killing the State banks, we have authorized the issue of $1,310,000,000 of currency by this Government. Of that there has actually been issued during the time since the establishment of this national banking system the amount of $736,000,000. There is probably in existence now from $650,000,000 to $700,000,000 of currency authorized by the United States and afloat in this country against $100,000,000 of the State bank currency.

Now, what will be the effect of extinguishing that $100,000,000 and the remainder of the State banks? It will only drive them into the national banking system, where there are facilities for still further expanding the currency, and there will be no check upon it whatever by the gentleman's amendment. We have been encouraging the rushing of capital into the national system of banking. At one time when there was no money in the Treasury to pay our soldiers, or the honest indebtedness of the country, we had $25,000,000 on deposit in national banks, the sole object and purpose of such deposit being to encourage the going into the national banking system. I know one single bank in Massachusetts, established under this national banking system, where the parties establishing the bank issued their bills to the extent of their capacity and never opened their doors from one week's end to the other. But at the end of the year, by the help of the interest upon their deposits and the use of their money which had gone out, not one dollar of which came back, they divided from eighteen to twenty per cent. upon their capital stock.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Chairman, it appears that the law as it now stands taxes these State banks one per cent. on their circulation, half of one per cent. on their deposits, and half of one per cent. upon their capital, making two per cent.; and they have to pay these taxes monthly. The law now provides that if they shall issue beyond ninety per cent. of their capital they shall be taxed two per cent. in addition.

Now, the present proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is, if I understand it aright, to tax these banks on their circulation, after the 1st of July, three per cent., and after the 1st of January six per cent. a year. It is avowed, and if it were not avowed it is sufficiently apparent, that the object is to destroy, and destroy by the 1st of January next, all these State banks. Now, I submit that this is unwise. These institutions being legitimate creations of the States, it is not wise for the General Government to adopt directly hostile legislation in reference to so large an interest, against the wishes of the people of the States.

In the State of New York there was, on the 1st of September last, invested in these State banks $107,306,000. While that large amount of capital was thus invested, and while the business of the State was largely dependent upon and connected with it, there was no evil growing out of the operations of these banks in reference to the increase of circulation. I hold in my hand the report of the superintendent of the bank department of that State; and this report shows that the circulation of the State banks was, on the 1st of September last, $32,000,000. This is a large amount; and it would be very destructive to the interests of the business community to withdraw it suddenly, or tax it out of existence. But that report shows that there has been no inflation; for I have the amount of circulation of our banks on the 1st of September in each year for ten years; and it was less last September by three or four millions than it ever was before.

Why, then, should Congress attack these State institutions, which are legitimate creations of the State, which subserv the interests of the business community of the State, and which, as my colleague [Mr. Brooks] has remarked, cannot be destroyed without injuriously affecting the interests of the business men of the State. The superintendent's report to which I have referred shows that, in consequence of the taxation to which the State banks are subjected, in addition to the taxation by the General Government, the banks organized under the national system have great advantages over the State banks so far as making money by banking is concerned.

The Federal Government holds out inducements to the establishment of these national banks by deposits, by furnishing them a circulation free of expense; and the State banks must gradually disappear under the policy already adopted. Why not, then, allow the change to be effected gradually, and not convulse the business community by suddenly striking out of existence, or taxing out of existence, $100,000,000 of capital and some thirty or forty millions of circulation?

The State banks now bear double the taxation imposed upon the national banks; and if the national banks, with the great advantages which they enjoy, cannot compete successfully with the State banks, it simply shows that the latter subserv better the interests of the business community, and should not be destroyed. It seems to me that we have gone as far as we should in holding out inducements in favor of the national system by subjecting the State system to heavy taxation; so heavy that in many of the States, and to some extent in New York, the State banks are gradually coming under the national system. We are now asked, substantially, to destroy these State institutions. If the States have the right to create these banks, where is the right or the justice of an attempt by the Federal Government to destroy them?

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I have prepared an amendment which I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] will accept as a modification of his amendment. It is as follows:

After the word "circulation," in line five, insert the words "and on deposit."

After the words "duty of," in line six, insert "and on deposits one twelfth of one per cent. upon the average amount of deposits of money subject to payment by check or draft, or represented by certificates of deposit or otherwise, and of."

Mr. HOOPER. I accept that.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

And any outstanding bills or circulation of any such bank or association so converted shall be included, so long as it shall remain unredeemed, as part of the amount of national circulating notes allowed and provided by law for national banking associations.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is proposed in order to reach this state of circumstances: where a State bank, with all of its notes outstanding, proposes to be converted into a national banking association, and has provided bonds to be deposited with the Government for that purpose, immediately takes out national circulation to an equal amount, this will prevent the issuing of national circulation until an equal amount of the old shall be redeemed. I do not think that the gentleman from Massachusetts or the gentleman from Iowa will object to this.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, although designed to relieve the State banks somewhat from the attempt now made to break them down, will in reality accomplish nothing in that way.

I do not know that I can add anything to what has been said already by my two colleagues from New York in reference to the general view to be taken of this matter; but I understand it to be conceded from what has occurred on the other side of the House that this is an attempt to break down and exterminate the State banks.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman will allow me to explain. It is not intended on this side of the House to break down the State banks. If we could have persuaded my friend from New York to vote for the amendment to the Constitution the other day I do not think that it would have had the effect to destroy him—it would really have been his regeneration.

Mr. PRUYN. Going from white to black is queer regeneration.

Mr. HOOPER. It is not to destroy the State banks, but to give them new life.

Mr. PRUYN. I cannot go into the constitutional argument to-day. There is no time under the five-minutes rule to go into that, or I would be glad to say something more than I did on the occasion when it was directly before the House.

I do understand it to be an attempt—an attempt which cannot be denied, with the duty sought to be imposed upon the State banks—it is an attempt to break down the State banks, or at least, if carried out, it must end in that thing. Look at the course of the State banks since the opening of the rebellion and the issuing of Government stocks under the legislation of Congress. I venture to say that at the present time, perhaps irrespective of the amount held by the national banks for circulation—I mean with that included—that the State banks hold a greater amount of the public debt than the national banks. They have come forward and taken them; and they have taken them, not for the purpose for which they were taken by the national banks—as a basis for circulation—but the State banks have taken the United States stocks as an investment, deriving only the advantage of the interest upon them, whereas the national banks have not only the benefit of the interest but the advantage of circulation. It seems to me that it would be better to get at this thing by some plain, direct legislation, than by this indirect mode. We are seeking to do that which my colleague [Mr. KERNAN] has shown will end in subverting, at least to a great degree, the business interests of the State of New York. The breaking down of these State banks will divert the capital invested in them into other channels of business, trade, and commerce.

These State banks, one or two of them, as remarked by my colleague, were created before the Revolution, and many of them shortly afterward; and certainly for the past twenty-five years they have been fairly and honestly doing great service, not only to the States where they are located, but to the United States at large. The question is whether we shall, by the exercise of arbitrary power, turn round and attempt to break down any class of institutions; I do not care what, which have been honestly chartered by the States and have been fairly and legitimately doing their duty. That is the question presented to the House under the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts by striking out the "1st day of July" and inserting the "2d day of January next," and to make the amendment conform to that amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the object of my amendment is to postpone the operations of the bill until the 1st of January next. By the law of Pennsylvania enabling these banks to become national banks they were authorized to continue the old circulation until the 1st day of January next. If they are to pay State tax and the tax provided by the gentleman from Massachusetts their taxes will be enormous. It would be such a tax as no banks could stand. It would be three per cent. upon banks, in addition to the State taxes. All the banks that have gone in under this law have gone in under the law as it stood. They went in under the enabling act of Pennsylvania. Now, I say it is unjust and, in my judgment, a violation of the understanding of the parties at the time the banks went in, to say that until the 1st of January their circulation shall become liable to additional taxation. And yet such would be the effect of it, notwithstanding the banks have, in good faith, gone in under the law. I do not myself believe that the amendment, or any part of it, is necessary. I believe that the banks of the country are coming in under the national banking law as fast as their condition will allow; and this driving banks out of existence all over the country in six or nine months, thus disturbing the whole business of the country, is, in my judgment, very injudicious, and will produce a great convulsion in the monetary matters of the country. I see no use for the amendment. Our old tax is heavy, and is sufficient. It was imposed at the time the national banking law passed, and it was deemed sufficient then. I think this amendment is carrying matters to extremes, and I think gentlemen will find that in their violent attempts to drive matters thus far they are violating the business of the country, and will do great mischief. But if it is to pass at all I ask that its operation be postponed until the 1st of January next, so that those banks which went into the existing state of things upon the faith that things should remain as they were shall not be caught in a trap, and not be compelled to pay double the amount they expected to pay.

Mr. WILSON. I am not surprised at the position taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for I very well remember he was in favor, during the Thirty-Seventh Congress, of the issuing of legal-tender notes to an extent unlimited, and I believe he has not changed his views since. In other words, he is in favor of an expansion of the currency without limit. At least he has never advocated any curtailment of the volume of the currency.

Mr. STEVENS. Allow me to say to the gentleman that he has stated a position just the reverse of any position I have ever taken. I never uttered such a sentiment.

Mr. WILSON. Of course I accept the gentleman's denial, and yet I think my recollection does not betray me as to a declaration which fell from his lips during the Thirty-Seventh Congress; but of course I must take his statement.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. At the time the legal-tender bill was introduced authorizing the issue of $150,000,000, it was asked by a gentleman across the way whether I expected to limit the issue to that amount. I replied I hoped we should be able to do so, and that I did not desire as large an expansion as that would make.

Mr. WILSON. I think that the action of the gentleman during the present session of Congress will bear out, not what he said, for he says he has said no such thing, but what I have said, that he is not opposed to the expansion of the currency. The bill which was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means a few days ago, and which passed this House, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to further expand the currency of the country by issuing legal-tender notes.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. WILSON. I know the Committee of Ways and Means so said at the time; but I do not understand that bill as they do. I understand that under the provisions of that bill the Secretary of the Treasury can issue, for circulation, notes to a greater amount than he could before its passage.

Now, sir, the argument which the gentleman presents in reference to the action of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania amounts to this, that we shall stop legislating in Congress upon this subject until the Legislature of Pennsylvania shall see fit to release the Pennsylvania banks from the provisions of the enabling act by virtue of which they are now coming into the national system; that the hands of Congress must be tied up by the Legislature of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that that is hugging closely the doctrine of State rights. Now, the banks of that State and the Legislature could not enter into an agreement which would suspend the power of Congress to legislate upon this subject. But my amendment proposes a remedy for what they complain of. My proposition is that after the 1st day of July no State bank in Pennsylvania shall be allowed to issue its own notes, or the notes of any other State bank, and if not issued, of course they will not have to pay the State tax; they will be relieved from taxation by the action of the State, and it will work no hardship whatever.

Now, in relation to the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], I think it is a good argument against almost everything that Congress has done, but I do not think it is a good argument against the substitute I have proposed. We have permitted an expansion of the currency beyond what we should have done. We have authorized the national banks to expand the currency to an amount equal to $300,000,000. I think that that is too great an expansion. I think we have issued legal-tender notes to a greater amount than we ought to have done. But because we have done it that is no reason why we should not stop somewhere, and require at least that the local banks shall not add additional volume to the currency of the country. Unless we adopt some provision of this kind, the national banks may expand their currency to the entire amount of $300,000,000, and the State banks may expand their circulation without any limitation whatever. I desire to prevent that expansion of the circulation of the State banks. We have determined, as a part of the policy of the country, that national banks shall go into existence and issue currency to the amount of $300,000,000.

The amendment of Mr. STEVENS was rejected.

Mr. DUMONT. I move further to amend by adding after the word "said" in line twelve of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, the following:

Except that banks which before the 1st of July next, 1865, shall have reduced their circulation three fourths since the 1st of January, 1862, shall not be subject on their remaining circulation to the tax imposed by the section to which this proviso is an amendment.

I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to be not so much a revenue measure as it is a financial measure. The intention is to compel the State banks to organize under the national system. So far as that is concerned, I make no objection to that policy. But I think that the amendment is not quite plain. It ought to be adapted to the facts. The banks ought to be rewarded to some extent for their good behavior since 1861. I think that some financial measure of this kind is necessary in regard to those State banks which have been expanding their circulation. I do not see that they are entitled to any consideration. They have not adapted themselves to the exigencies of the country. But many of the State banks have acted without compulsion just as the gentleman would require them to act now under compulsion.

Take the Bank of the State of Indiana, for instance, and let us see what it has done since 1861, and see whether it ought to be visited now with exemplary punishment. On the 31st of December, 1861, the circulation of the Bank of the State of Indiana was $5,979,419, or, in round numbers, $6,000,000. It is to-day only $1,524,948. The bank has withdrawn four fifths of its entire circulation. It ought not to be punished for its good behavior. It is willing to be punished for its bad behavior, but not for its good behavior.

Let us look a little further into this matter and see how this bank has been conducted. What I say in regard to the Bank of the State of Indiana I imagine will apply to other States. I simply refer to the bank of my own State because I am more familiar with its operation than I am with those of other States. On the 31st day of December, 1861, the circulation of that bank was $5,979,419, and in 1862 the circulation was $4,922,951. The reduction of the circulation of the Bank of Indiana, in 1863, was $2,359,106, and in 1864, $1,038,897; in three years a reduction of $4,454,471.

Now, Mr. Chairman, bear in mind that the circulation of this bank was not illegal. It is a legal institution. Its franchise was granted to it by the State, and its circulation was properly guaranteed. It was not a contraband circulation, either as against law or as against public opinion. As soon as it became contraband only in public opinion, not by the laws of the country; when public opinion became settled that the national institutions ought to supplant the State institutions, the Bank of the State of Indiana went to work liberally and withdrew its circulation. This amendment now proposes to increase the tax imposed by the law of last session on the circulation of the State banks. I do not object to that, but I simply come forward with my amendment and say that this increased taxation shall not be imposed upon these institutions that are withdrawing their circulation, before 1866. It is simply warning them, putting them on their good behavior, and adopting a kind of sliding scale in behalf of those institutions.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the committee will not rise for such a purpose.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration, as a special order, the tax bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that all debate on the banking amendments, and on all amendments thereto, terminate in ten minutes after the consideration of the bill shall have been resumed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the tax bill; the question being on Mr. DUMONT's amendment to the amendment, on which debate was ordered to be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the avowal of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] that the main object of this measure is to affect the State banks, should arrest the attention of the committee. The importance of the subject as affecting local interests and favoring certain citizens to the injury of others, cannot be misapprehended. I hold in my hand, as indicative of the cause of this amendment and of the influences controlling legislation on this subject, the message of the Governor of Massachusetts, delivered before the General Assembly of that State on the 6th day of the present month, in which the subject of the currency is reviewed. I desire that a passage from this message be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"I find by the report of the Comptroller of the Currency (under date of November 25, 1864) that the aggregate capital stock paid in of all the national banking associations then organized was $108,964,597 28, and that of this sum those of Massachusetts had $25,909,040; so that the paid-in capital of the national banking associations organized in Massachusetts is nearly one quarter part of the aggregate."

ized in Massachusetts is nearly one quarter part of the aggregate."

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that the single State of Massachusetts, which is now bringing its power to crush out the local banking institutions of other States by heavy taxation, has obtained, by an unusual activity of her capitalists or a singular favoritism, the control of nearly one fourth part of all the capital stock and of the paper circulation issued under the general banking law of the nation. Massachusetts having thus secured so large a portion of the national bank capital, a system so favorable to capital, now proposes to increase the value of her capital by oppressing less favored States. I submit that perhaps the motive in bringing forward this measure, so hostile to the capital of the newer States, is to suborn the interests of the nation and of those States to the capital of the State which the gentleman [Mr. HOOPER] represents.

Mr. HOOPER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, if it is very brief.

Mr. HOOPER. The banking capital of Massachusetts is about sixty million dollars. Of that about twenty-five million dollars is employed under the national banking system. There has been no increase under this new system to her banking capital.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it is constantly changing. The State is rapidly absorbing not merely her quota, but a large portion of the $300,000,000 authorized by the national banking law to be issued; and the message to which I have referred shows that that very policy is to be encouraged in that State. I propose now to contrast with Massachusetts the banking policy of another State; and we shall see, sir, who are responsible for the excessive increase of paper circulation, and which State has contributed the most to reduce the volume of circulation, to diminish which is the pretense of this amendment. I ask to have read the statement which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Reduction of the circulation of the Bank of the State of Indiana, including her twenty branches, in the past three years.
Amount of circulation December 31, 1861.....$5,979,419
Amount of circulation December 31, 1862.....4,922,951

JAMES M. RAY, Cashier.

Mr. ALLEY. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. It must be a very brief one; my five minutes are nearly gone.

Mr. ALLEY. I wish to know if those who are managing the State banking institutions of Indiana are not in favor of this very proposition?

Mr. HOLMAN. The bank managers of the State of Indiana are protesting against it as an attempt to favor one class of capitalists at the expense of another class.

Mr. ALLEY. Then I have been misinformed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentlemen connected with the system protest against this measure as oppressive. They have done all they could to reduce their circulation. No institution in the Union has been better or wiser administered than the Bank of the State of Indiana. They have reduced their circulation since the war began from $5,979,419 to $1,524,948, while other States have only converted their circulation into the more profitable form of national currency without any reduction of its amount. The local banks have not expanded the currency, but reduced it, and now a proposition is brought forward to compel them to abandon their system entirely, and all for the benefit of the capitalists who have monopolized the national banks for the most part—

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] whether the representatives of the State banks of Indiana are opposed to that provision of my substitute which forbids the reissuance of notes by State banks after the 1st of July?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that particular provision of the substitute would not be objected to. But the effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] is to tax the State banks oppressively upon the circulation which they cannot withdraw. It compels them to pay from three to six percent. upon that portion of circulation which they cannot control, while the national banks on their circulation pay but one percent. The object is not to revise, but to destroy State banks for the benefit of the national banks.

The question was then taken upon Mr. DUMONT's amendment; and it was adopted.

Mr. DAWES. I move to strike out the last clause of the amendment now pending. I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that I have already called the attention of the committee to the mistaken policy in the State of Massachusetts of encouraging the adoption of these national banks. I do not believe it meets the commendation of the people of Massachusetts. It is true that the Governor of Massachusetts, and all the gentlemen connected with this policy of national bank currency, are urging everybody to go into the national banking system, and what is the consequence? Whereas, before the adoption of this new policy, Massachusetts derived from her State banks a revenue sufficient to pay all her current State expenses, she now does not receive a dollar from that source, although she has added $20,000,000 to her debt, and an immense amount of her taxable capital has become invested in United States bonds. It has come to this in Massachusetts, that the burdens of that State, increasing upon her year after year by millions and millions of dollars, are to be borne by poor men, while right side by side with them are the millionaires exempt from taxation by this mistaken policy of the United States, driving the money of the country into national banks and into the bonds of the United States, which are exempt from taxation.

The time is coming in Massachusetts, as I think it will come all over the country, when that policy will be condemned, and when it will be impossible for the country to stand up against the just demands of all men that those who are able to bear the burdens shall bear at least their share of them. The policy into which the State of Massachusetts has been urged has resulted in this, that the burden is thrown more and more upon the poor man and less and less upon the rich man. I have no sympathy with that policy myself, and no vote of mine shall ever be given for it. The men in Massachusetts and in this country who have the money should at least bear their share of the burdens of the country. The policy which we have been discussing here to-day has more than anything else brought about that state of things which I deprecate as much as the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

I now withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move the following as a substitute for the amendment:

That the general banking law be hereby repealed, and that the banks organized under it be allowed twenty days within which to wind up their affairs.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has somewhat anticipated the remarks which I wished to make upon this subject. In the West, as in Massachusetts, there is to be an outbreak of popular feeling against this whole system of national banks. The people will not submit to having the large capitalists, who have derived profit from the expenditures of this war, escape from their share of State and municipal taxation. They will not consent to have the poor man bear the whole burden of taxation, (not necessary solely for the support of the State government, but created by the very necessities of this war,) while they see the rich man protecting himself under these provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted under the order of the House.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment of Mr. MILLER, of New York, to the substitute of Mr. WILSON, was rejected.

The question then recurred on the substitute. Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the substitute by inserting after the word "said" in the twelfth line the following:

Except that banks which, before the 1st of July, 1863, shall have reduced their circulation three-fourths since the 1st of January, 1862, shall only be subject, in their remaining circulation, to the tax imposed by the section to which this proviso is an amendment.

Mr. HOOPER. That has been already adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been adopted as an amendment to the original proposition, but not as an amendment to the substitute.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I offer the following amendment to the substitute:

In line fourteen strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seven."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUMONT. I offer the following amendment to the substitute:

Add after the word "capital" in line fifteen the words "existing when the same was issued."

The amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes sixty-two, noes not counted.

The question recurring on the substitute as amended, it was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes seventeen, noes not counted.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. HOOPER.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

And no national banking association, after it shall have received from the Comptroller of the Currency any of its notes, shall pay out the notes of any State bank or banking association; and no State bank or banking association shall issue for circulation any notes of its own or of any other State bank or banking association after the 1st day of January, 1866.

On agreeing to the amendment to the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes thirty-two.

Mr. WILSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON, and SRELE of New York, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 65.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out in line fourteen the word "five" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ten;" so that the clause will read:

And to an amount not exceeding ten per cent. of the chartered or declared capital.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN moved the following amendment:

In line fifteen, after the word "capital" insert "existing when the same was established;" so that it will read:

And whenever the outstanding circulation of any bank, association, corporation, company, or person shall be reduced to an amount not exceeding five per cent. of the chartered or declared capital existing when the same was established, said circulation shall be free from taxation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to amend, in the twenty-second line, by striking out "five" and inserting "ten;" so that it will read:

And whenever any State bank or banking association has been converted into a national banking association, and such national banking association has assumed the liabilities of such State bank or banking association, including the redemption of its bills, such national banking association shall be held to make the required return and payment on the circulation outstanding, so long as such circulation shall exceed ten per cent. of the capital before such conversion of such State bank or banking association.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to modify the amendment I offered a few moments ago, as follows:

And no national banking association or State bank, or banking association, shall, after the 1st day of January, 1866, issue or pay out any notes for circulation other than those issued by national banking associations.

Mr. PRUYN. I insist that that amendment is not in order, as it has been already voted down by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been modified.

Mr. PRUYN. Did the gentleman from Iowa purposely omit the word "national" before the word "banks" the second time?

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the gentleman from New York what my object is exactly this: to prevent a national bank, or State bank, or banking association, from issuing any other bank notes than those of the national banking associations after the 1st day of January next.

Mr. PRUYN. It prohibits State circulation entirely?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir, after the 1st day of January next.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I raise the point of order that this is a bill for revenue, and that a provision such as the gentleman has proposed, prohibiting the circulation of a certain class of money, is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question then recurred on Mr. HOOPER's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

That section one hundred and sixteen be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: That there shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the annual gains, profits, and income of every person residing in the United States, or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from any kind of property, rents, interests, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, a duty of five per cent. on the excess over $600 and not exceeding $3,000, and a duty of ten per cent. on the excess over $3,000. And the duty herein provided for shall be assessed, collected, and paid upon the gains, profits, and income for the year ending the 31st day of December next preceding the time for levying, collecting, and paying said duty: Provided, That income derived from interest upon notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States shall be included in estimating incomes under this section, and shall also include all premiums on gold or coupons: Provided, further, That only one deduction of $600 shall be made from the aggregate incomes of all the members of any family, composed of parents and minor children, or husband and wife, except in cases where such separate income shall be derived from the separate and individual estate, gains, or labor of the wife or child: And provided, further, That net profits realized by sales of real estate purchased since January 1, 1864, shall be chargeable as income, and losses on sales of real estate purchased since January 1, 1864, and sold within the year for which income is estimated, shall be deducted from the income of such year.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend by striking out the words "estate" and "wife or" and inserting "such;" so that it will read:

Except in cases where such separate income shall be derived from the separate and individual gains or labor of such child.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to modify his amendment by striking out all after the word "wife" in the six hundred and thirty-fourth line and inserting the word "such" in the six hundred and thirty-sixth line; so that it will read:

That only one deduction of $600 shall be made from the aggregate incomes of all the members of any family, composed of parents and minor children, or husband and wife.

Mr. BROOMALL. I modify my amendment in that way. My object is to prevent frauds upon the revenue. It will prevent a man of wealth from dividing up his property among his wife and children so as to exempt $600 for his wife and $600 for each child. What I want is to leave the law as it now stands, so as to let one family, composed of wife and minor children, have only one $600 exempt from taxation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to add the following:

And in ascertaining the income of any person liable to the income tax the amount of income received from institutions whose officers, as required by law, withhold a per cent. of the dividends made by such institutions and pay the same to the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue, or other officer authorized to receive the same, shall be included, and the amount so withheld shall be deducted from the tax which otherwise would be assessed upon such person.

The object of the amendment is to prevent persons whose incomes are derived from dividends upon bank, railway, and other stocks, from escaping the ten per cent. tax upon the excess over $3,000. That is the sole object of the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I see no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to strike out in line six hundred and twenty-one "three" and insert "five;" and in line six hundred and twenty-three strike out "three" and insert "five;" so that it will read:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the annual gains, profits, and income of every person residing in the United States, or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from any kind of property, rents, interests, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, a duty of five per cent. on the excess over $600 and not exceeding $3,000, and a duty of ten per cent. on the excess over $3,000.

I propose this amendment to the bill because I think the ten per cent. tax should not be placed upon incomes of $3,000, nor upon any incomes less than $5,000. Three thousand dollars in greenbacks is not so heavy an income as to meet with such a visitation from this House. I do not think many families can live upon an income of that size, and no reason can occur to my friend why it should be taxed to the extent it is proposed by this bill. I think five per cent. is ample upon incomes exceeding $600 and not exceeding $5,000.

Mr. ROSS. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, or rather to offer one that covers and extends beyond that of the gentleman from Kentucky. It is as follows:

Amend in line six hundred and twenty-one by striking out "six hundred" and inserting "one thousand;" in line six hundred and twenty-three strike out "three" and insert "five," and add after the word "dollars" in line six hundred and twenty-three "and a duty of fifteen per cent. on the excess over $5,000 and under $10,000, and a duty of twenty per cent. on the excess over $20,000."

Amend line six hundred and thirty-one by striking out the word "six" and inserting "one thousand."

I am in hopes this amendment will be made. It covers the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, and goes still further. It proposes first to strike out the $600 exemption clause, and make it $1,000. That is a just exemption, considering the expenses of living. Then the increase proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky commences at $5,000 and ends at $10,000. Mine is extended to fifteen per cent. on incomes over $15,000 and twenty per cent. on those of $20,000 and over.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that this is but just in the present condition of our country. We must in some degree relieve the poor men of the country from the heavy burden of taxation which rests upon them. The few who have these large incomes are better able to contribute to the necessities of the Government than any other class. The men with incomes of $15,000 and upward can better afford to pay fifteen or twenty per cent. on that income than the poor man can upon his $1,000 or $1,500. There is a class of individuals who are not being reached as thoroughly by the taxation which we are now levying upon the people of the country as they should be.

I know the eastern men tell us they tax their manufacturers. How do they tax their manufacturers? They put an additional price upon manufactured commodities; but who pays it? The consumer. They tell us they tax their railroads. How do they tax them? Why, sir, for every dollar of additional taxation we put upon the railroads of the country the companies are remunerated by charges made upon the people. The merchants of the West pay it upon the transportation of their goods from the East; and the farmer of the West pays it in the additional charges imposed upon the transportation of his produce to the East. Now I ask gentlemen upon this floor who represent the agricultural interests of the country to say whether it is not time we should reach the capital of the country and relieve in some degree the agriculture of the country from the onerous burdens of taxation which is being fastened upon them. I trust this amendment, so reasonable, so just in its character, will commend itself to the House.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of terminating debate upon this paragraph.

Mr. ANCONA. I call for tellers upon the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KELLOGG of New York and DAWSON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty-eight, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that all debate upon the paragraph pending in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and all amendments thereto, shall cease in five minutes after the Committee shall again resume the consideration thereof.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the tax bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out this entire section, and I do it for the purpose of making a suggestion to which I wish some attention given by the Committee of Ways and Means.

I believe that this income tax, as now administered, is the very essence of injustice, and unless some change can be made in the law so as to remove its fundamental difficulties, I hope it will be voted out of this bill.

I dislike to make any such suggestion as this, because I desire to do everything in my power to increase the revenue, but this bill makes no discrimination between the sources from which income is derived. One man with nothing in the world except his hands, by his energy makes $2,000 a year, it may be; another, with $50,000 invested in lands, does not work, produces not one dollar, and adds nothing to the wealth of the country, and at the end of the year receives as rental of his estate $2,000; he pays precisely the same tax and only the same as the man who has nothing.

There is no equality in this mode of taxation. I believe, sir, that the Committee of Ways and Means ought to devise a system by which incomes derived from different sources may pay different rates, so that labor and production may be encouraged.

Mr. MORRILL. Is the gentleman from Ohio prepared to give up thirty-five or fifty millions of income tax and propose a tax directly upon the real estate of the country?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say to the gentleman that I do not think it necessary to give up the income tax, but I do think it necessary to recast this section so that there shall be a discrimination between different kinds of income. That can be done without levying a direct tax upon land.

There are men who have no other capital than their hands and brains, who are taxed more than men worth sixty, seventy, eighty, and a hundred thousand dollars. I can give examples by the dozen of precisely such instances from the working of the income law of last session. A captain in the Army with a family to support, and with no wealth but his salary, pays more income tax to the Government than many a man who has $50,000 invested and lives comfortably without labor or risk.

This mode of taxation is the very soul of injustice, and if the Committee of Ways and Means cannot devise some mode of adapting the tax to a better scale of justice than this we had better repeal it. But I believe it can be made tolerable by such a classification of sources of income as is made in the law of Great Britain for 1842, and by taxing the income of labor less than that which arises from unproductive wealth. I throw out this suggestion that some response may be made to relieve the bald injustice of this tax as it stands before the country.

The question was taken on Mr. Ross's amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. MALLORY's amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "three" and inserting "six."

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to—ayes 41, noes 59.

Mr. MALLORY's amendment was then agreed to—ayes 65, noes 56.

Mr. ANCONA. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line six hundred and forty-two:

Provided further, That the special income tax imposed by joint resolution, approved July 4, 1864, shall not apply to incomes of the officers of the Army and Navy for the year 1863, since discharged by reason of disability from wounds received or disease contracted in the service, or by expiration of term of service: And provided further, Whenever said tax has been assessed and paid by such officers, or by their widows in cases where they have died, the same shall be refunded, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the question of order on the amendment that it is not germane to anything in the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair thinks that it is germane to the paragraph.

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers on his amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ANCONA and BAXTER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to amend by striking out, in line six hundred and twenty-one, "$600" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,000;" so that it will read "a duty of five per cent. on the excess over $1,000."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to amend by inserting the following as an additional section:

Every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of notes of any State banks or State banking associations paid out by them after the 1st day of January, 1866.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that his amendment will come in better as an additional section at another point.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to wait. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ECKLEY. I move to amend by striking out the words "on the excess over $600 and," so that it will read "a duty of five per cent. on not exceeding $3,000."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to amend by striking out all that appertains to the income tax and by substituting therefor a provision requiring the imposition of two per cent. on sales.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that that amendment had better be offered when we come to the clause in regard to sales. He will then have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I desire to offer it as a substitute to the income tax.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I make the question of order that the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment is not in order at present.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend by adding, at the end of the paragraph, the words "derived from sales of real estate;" so that it will read:

Provided further, That net profits realized by sales of real estate purchased since January 1, 1864, shall be chargeable as income, and losses on sales of real estate purchased since January 1, 1864, and sold within the year for which income is estimated, shall be deducted from the income of such year derived from sales of real estate.

I suppose that that was the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in error on that point. The effect of his amendment would be—

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) The House has closed debate on the whole paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by striking out "$600" and inserting "$800;" so that it will read "a duty of five per cent. on the excess over $800."

The question being on the amendment,

Mr. INGERSOLL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. INGERSOLL and HOOPER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANCONA. I move to amend by adding the following proviso:

Provided further, That the special income tax imposed by joint resolution approved July 4, 1864, shall not apply to incomes of the officers of the Army and Navy for the year 1863, since discharged by reason of disability from wounds received or disease contracted in the service or by expiration of term of service.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a question of order. That amendment has been already voted on once and voted down.

Mr. ANCONA. The amendment is changed since it was voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is not the same amendment as was proposed before.

Mr. MORRILL. Virtually the same thing.

Mr. ANCONA. Virtually not the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question being on the amendment,

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ANCONA and HOOPER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] withdraw his amendment to strike out the section?

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw it. I only wanted to have an opportunity of saying what I did.

Mr. GANSON moved to amend the paragraph by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That no tax shall be imposed on any income derived solely from a salary not exceeding $1,000 per annum.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. PRUYN moved to strike out the entire paragraph as amended.

The motion was not agreed to.

The next paragraph was then read.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend this paragraph by inserting after the words "unsold or on hand during the year next preceding the 31st of December," the words "until the same shall be sold." I offer this to obviate a construction that might be given, that the property thus deducted one year shall not be subject to this taxation the succeeding year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GANSON. I move to amend the first clause of the paragraph by inserting after the words "all national, State, and municipal taxes," the words "or assessments." I offer this amendment because there are different constructions given to those words by different tribunals.

Mr. MORRILL. As it is now very near the time for the House to take a recess, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the tax bill, (H. R. No. 744,) and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The hour of half-past four has arrived, at which time the House has ordered that a recess be taken until seven o'clock p. m.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to dispense with the session to-night.

The SPEAKER. The hour has arrived for taking a recess.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Is there no way to dispense with to-night's session?

The SPEAKER. It might have been done by a motion before the hour of half past four had arrived.

Mr. MALLORY. I rose to make the motion as soon as the gentleman from New York [Mr. POMEROY] completed his report from the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The hour fixed upon by the House for the recess had arrived when the gentleman from New York [Mr. POMEROY] made his report.

Mr. MALLORY. How could the Chair receive his report, then?

The SPEAKER. He had just completed his report when the hour arrived. By unanimous consent, the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] to dispense with the session to-night can be received and voted upon.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The House thereupon took a recess until seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

Mr. GRIDER asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had concurred in the amendment of the House to joint resolution (S. R. No. 42) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 143) to facilitate the adjustment of certain accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of recaptured Africans in Liberia; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill to increase the salary of the district judge for the district of Kansas, with a recommendation that the bill do not pass.

The bill was laid on the table.

HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary reported back House bill No. 754, to repeal the act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," with a recommendation that the bill do not pass.

The bill was laid on the table.

The bill was laid on the table.

JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 665, to provide compensation of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the payment of their traveling expenses, with a recommendation that the bill do not pass.

The bill was laid on the table.

WILLIAM CORNELL JEWETT.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Cornell Jewett, praying that the consideration of the amendment to the Constitution be postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

ENFORCEMENT OF CONTRACTS.

Mr. WILSON also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported adversely upon the memorial of Jesse Baldwin, of Mahoning county, Ohio, asking Congress to pass an act declaring that all just, legal, and equitable contracts shall be enforced according to the plain legal meaning of the words employed therein.

DISTRICT JUDGE OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. WILSON also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported adversely on the memorial of O. P. Temple, and others, of East Tennessee, praying an increase of the salary of the district judge of Tennessee.

MARRIAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary, bill H. R. No. 735 in relation to marriages in the District of Columbia, and moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read at length.

It provides for the repeal, as to the District of Columbia, of the ninth section of an act concerning marriages, passed by the Legislature of Maryland in 1777, and found in Dorsey's Laws of that State, volume one, page 133, which section was extended to the District of Columbia by the act of Congress of February 27, 1801.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to inquire, what are the provisions of the section which it is proposed to repeal?

Mr. WILSON. That section provides that if any clergyman shall solemnize the rites of marriage between minors he shall be subjected to a penalty by fine or imprisonment, or both, as the court may determine; and this notwithstanding a license may have been issued authorizing the solemnization of the marriage. This bill proposes simply to repeal that penalty, so that if a marriage should be solemnized in pursuance of a license issued by the proper authority, the minister shall not be liable to punishment if the parties be minors.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I have no objection to that. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Messrs. O'NEILL, of Ohio, MIDDLETON, and HOLMAN, asked and obtained leave of absence.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask leave of absence for the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. SPALDING, for this evening. He informed me, when he left the Hall this afternoon, that he was quite unwell. Leave was granted.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask leave of absence for a few days for my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON. Leave was granted.

JOHN FAUST.

Mr. LAW, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions adversely upon the application of John Faust for a pension.

many have been sold, if any; at what price; and who received the money.

REMOVAL OF ST. LOUIS ARSENAL.

Mr. KNOX. I move that Senate bill No. 402, an act to repeal an act entitled "An act to remove the United States arsenal from the city of St. Louis, and to provide for the sale of the lands on which the same is located," be taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PREEMPTION AND HOMESTEAD RIGHTS.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Public Lands bill H. R. No. 604, entitled "An act to prevent deserters and others therein named from acquiring publiclands under the preemption and homestead laws."

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

LAKE SUPERIOR SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Public Lands House bill No. 745, making a grant of alternate sections of public land to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a breakwater and harbor on Lake Superior by means of a ship-canal to connect Lake Superior with Lake Portage on the upper peninsula of said State, in order that it may be printed and recommittees.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I object unless it is agreed that the bill is not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. DRIGGS. If I cannot explain the bill satisfactorily to the gentleman I will agree to that.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Unless we have that understanding I must object.

Mr. DRIGGS. Well, then, I agree to that understanding.

The bill and substitute were received and re-committed, and the substitute was ordered to be printed.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER stated that he would not be present during the entire evening, and if there were no objection he would appoint Mr. ASHLEY of Ohio as Speaker pro tempore, to receive the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I am not well, and I ask, by unanimous consent, that leave of absence be granted to me for this evening.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I have not felt so well for three months as I feel this evening, and I would like to go off to enjoy my good health. I therefore ask for leave of absence. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the TAX BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be on the amendment moved by Mr. GANSON. The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike out the following words:

And there shall also be deducted the income derived from dividends on shares in the capital stock of any bank, trust company, savings institution, insurance, railroad, canal, wharfe, canal navigation, or slack-water company, and the interest on any bonds or other evidences of indebtedness of any such corporation or company, which shall have been assessed and the tax paid, as hereinafter provided.

That is rendered necessary by an amendment to the preceding paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add the following:

And provided further, That salaries of officers of the Army under the grade of major, while such officers are in actual service in the field, shall not be subject to an income tax.

Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that this only applies to salaries of captains and first and second lieutenants. I believe that it is agreed upon all hands that the salary received by these officers is too small at the present time, and it may be that no successful effort will be made during the present Congress to increase it. The salary of officers above the grade of captain, it is understood, is reasonable to a certain extent. My proposition is to exempt the salaries of officers under the grade of major who are in the field from taxation; and it seems to me that it should commend itself to the favorable consideration of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I understand from the chairman of the Military Committee, [Mr. SCHENCK] that this has been considered in a bill which that committee is about to report, and I think, therefore, that it is better not to consider it here. I hope that the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that if a general bill is passed on the subject the Senate may strike this out, and if none be passed this will be so much gained.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will remark that the general bill for the relief of officers of the Army, providing certain advantages for officers in the field, includes, among other things, a release from this income tax. That bill is now in the hands of a member of the Military Committee, and will be reported on Saturday next. This amendment might clash with that bill, and perhaps it would be better to provide for the whole thing in one bill than to legislate partially in an appropriation bill. I state this for the information of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that this is to be reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, and perhaps with a wider scope, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to strike from the following these words, "other than the companies specified in this section:"

And also all income or gains derived from the purchase and sale of stocks or other property, real or personal, and of live stock, and the amount of live stock, sugar, wool, butter, cheese, pork, beef, mutton, or other meats, hay and grain, or other vegetable or other productions, being the growth or produce of the estate of such person sold, not including any part thereof unsold or on hand during the year next preceding the 31st of December, shall be included and assessed as part of the income of such person for each year, and the gains and profits of all companies, whether incorporated or partnership, other than the companies specified in this section, shall be included in estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of any person entitled to the same, whether divided or otherwise.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRUYN. I call the attention of the gentleman having charge of this bill to these words: And may increase the amount of any list or return if he has reason to believe that the same is understated.

The principle laid down here is inconsistent with the succeeding clause. If there be no satisfactory explanation it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL. The bill requires that in all cases the return shall be made under oath, and that that shall be prima facie evidence, but not conclusive. It is intended still to leave the power with the assistant assessor to increase the amount if he is not satisfied with the oath; and to protect the party, if he is dissatisfied, he may take an appeal.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend by inserting in line seven hundred and forty-nine, after the words "United States," the words "upon all his or her gains or profits as provided by this act;" so that the clause will read:

Provided, That any party, in his or her own behalf, or as guardian or trustee, shall be permitted to declare, under oath or affirmation, the form and manner of which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that he or she was not possessed of an income of $500, liable to be assessed according to the provisions of this act, or may declare that he or she has been assessed and paid an income duty elsewhere in the same year under authority of the United States, upon all of his or her gains or profits as provided by this act, and if the assistant assessor shall be satisfied of the truth of the declaration shall thereupon be exempt from income duty in said district.

I offer this amendment because, by the terms of this act, a person might fraudulently in one district make a return of income not covering his entire income as intended by the act, and then in the place where by law he should make his return of income he simply makes an affidavit that he has made a return of income in another district; and by making such affidavit before the assessor he would be discharged by the terms of this act from making the return which is contemplated by the law. My object is simply to prevent a fraud upon the law itself.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not see that there is any great necessity of the amendment, and I see no harm in it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend by inserting in line seven hundred and fifteen, after the word "aforesaid," the words "which list shall state the specific source of each item of income, and the amount thereof."

Mr. STEVENS. I really think that would be very inconvenient and vexatious. I cannot see any necessity for it, and I hope it will not be adopted.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out of line seven hundred and ninety-seven the words "with intent to evade" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "contrary to;" so that the clause shall read:

That any person or persons who shall make, sign, or issue, or who shall cause to be made, signed, or issued, any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatsoever, or shall accept, negotiate, or pay, or cause to be accepted, negotiated, or paid, any bill of exchange, draft, or order or promissory note, for the payment of money, without the same being duly stamped, or having thereon an adhesive stamp for denoting the duty chargeable thereon, contrary to the provisions of this act, shall, for every such offense, forfeit the sum of $200, and such instrument, document, or paper, bill, draft, order, or note shall be deemed invalid and of no effect.

I offer another amendment in the same clause in a subsequent line, by striking out "two hundred" and inserting "fifty."

Mr. THAYER. I object. Only one amendment can be offered at one time.

The CHAIRMAN. One amendment only is in order.

Mr. THAYER. This seems to me to be a very extraordinary proposition. The effect of it is to impose for a mere inadvertent or casual omission to affix a stamp the heavy penalty of $200. As the law stands now you must, in order to impose that penalty, show that the party designedly omitted the stamp for the purpose of defrauding the revenue. It has never been heard in any stamp act that a penalty like this, or that any penalty, has been imposed for a mere neglect or unintentional omission of a stamp. The Committee of Ways and Means, I beg leave to say, are taking a wrong direction in regard to this provision of the law. Instead of liberalizing it, they are making it more and more stringent; while the British Government, which has had more experience upon this subject than any other Government upon the face of the earth, has from year to year been enacting statutes for the purpose of liberalizing and modifying the stamp act, the Committee of Ways and Means are taking an opposite direction and are attempting to make the law more stringent and more oppressive. I hope the Committee of the Whole will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. As I said nothing in reference to this amendment when I offered it, I will now briefly state the purpose of it. In the first place it is proposed to reduce the penalty from two hundred to fifty dollars for a mere casual neglect; and then I propose to insert after the words "invalid and of no effect" the words "and in case of such omission or neglect with intent to evade the provisions of this act, the person so guilty shall forfeit $200." So gentlemen will see that the object was merely to graduate the penalty according to the offense. It is supposed that some penalty should be imposed in cases of mere accident, otherwise we could not enforce the law.

Mr. THAYER. I was about to propose an amendment which should incorporate into this law, in express terms, the provisions of the British statute upon this subject. The leading provisions of that statute, which has now been in force for fifteen years in Great Britain, and which has been found perfectly satisfactory both to the people and to the Government in protecting the people against the designs of dishonest persons, and the revenue against fraud upon the stamp act, are these: in the first place there is a provision enabling any party in interest at any time to affix a stamp upon an instrument upon going to the proper revenue officer and paying a certain penalty which now, by the British act, is £10; and there is a further provision that in case of mere inadvertence or unintentional omission, the stamp shall be affixed to the instrument by the revenue officer upon payment of the proper stamp duty, without the penalty, provided the application be made within twelve months after the instrument was issued or made.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that those who have had most experience in the Internal Revenue Office since we have established stamp duties here are clearly of the opinion that we can collect no revenue unless we have penalties as heretofore, and that the English system will not answer here in the early history of stamp duties.

Mr. THAYER. Why not?

Mr. MORRILL. For the reason that the stamp duties cannot be enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRILL's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. THAYER. I move to strike out all after the words "provided further" in line eight hundred and five, down to the end of line eight hundred and twenty-eight, as follows:

That no deed, instrument, document, writing, or paper, required by law to be stamped, which was made, signed, or issued prior to the 1st day of August, 1864, without being duly stamped, or with a deficient stamp, nor any copy thereof, shall be recorded or admitted or used as evidence in any court until a legal stamp or stamps, denoting the amount of duty, shall have been affixed thereto, and the date when the same is so used or affixed, with his initials, shall have been placed thereon by the person using the same; and the person desiring to use or record any such deed, instrument, document, writing, or paper, as evidence, his agent or attorney is authorized, in the presence of the court, register, or recorder, respectively, to affix the stamp or stamps thereon required: And provided further, That no instrument, document, or paper, made, signed, or issued prior to said 1st day of August, 1864, without being duly stamped, or having thereon an adhesive stamp or stamps to denote the duty imposed thereon, shall, for that cause, if the stamp or stamps required shall be subsequently affixed, be deemed invalid and of no effect; and the holder thereof, or any person desiring to use the same, his agent or attorney, is authorized to affix thereon the stamp or stamps required.

That hereafter in all cases where the party has not affixed to any instrument required by the one hundred and fifty first section of the act of June 30, 1864, or schedule marked "B" thereunto annexed, the stamp thereby required to be thereunto affixed at the time of making or issuing said instrument, and he, or they, or any party having an interest therein shall be subsequently desirous of affixing such stamp to said instrument, he or they shall appear before the collector of the revenue of the proper district, who shall, upon the payment of the price of the proper stamp required by law and a penalty of fifty dollars, and, when the whole amount of the duty denoted by the stamp required shall exceed the sum of fifty dollars, or payment also of interest at the rate of six per cent. on said duty from the day on which such stamp ought to have been affixed, affix the proper stamp to such instrument, and note upon the margin of said instrument the date of his so doing and the fact that such penalty has been paid; and such instrument shall thereupon be deemed and held to be as valid to all intents and purposes as if stamped when made or issued: And provided further, That where it shall appear to said collector, upon oath or otherwise to his satisfaction, that any such instrument has not been duly stamped at the time of making or issuing the same by reason of accident, mistake, inadvertence, or urgent necessity, and without any willful design to defraud the United States of the stamp duty or to evade or delay the payment thereof, then and in such case, if such instrument shall, within twelve calendar months after the making or issuing thereof, be brought to the said collector of revenue to be stamped and the stamp duty chargeable thereon shall be paid, it shall be lawful for the said collector to remit the penalty aforesaid and to cause such instrument to be duly stamped.

Mr. Chairman, if I can succeed in making my amendment understood, I believe that it will be adopted by the committee. The provisions of the amendment have been copied almost verbatim from the English statute of August 14, 1850, the 13th and 14th Victoria. If I were to cause that statute to be read it would take up pretty nearly all of the five minutes which I have to explain my amendment, and therefore I cannot do it, but I have the statute here, and I hope that any member of the committee who desires further information in regard to it will look at it.

There are two points in this amendment. As I said before, these provisions have now been in force in England for nearly fifteen years, and they have given universal satisfaction. There has been very great complaint of the operation of our stamp law. It is a common thing for these stamps to be omitted by ignorant persons, and for an undue and unfair advantage to be taken of that fact by dishonest persons. Now, the British statute remedies that. It declares that this stamp may be affixed, where there has been a neglect to affix it at the time, at any time upon the payment of the prescribed penalty, which penalty is sufficient to deter persons from designedly omitting it. The penalty under the British statute is £10. I have made it in my amendment a corresponding sum, or nearly so—fifty dollars.

There is a further provision in the British statute that where the omission has been merely an oversight, or an inadvertent omission, the parties interested in the instrument may take it to a revenue officer and have the stamp affixed without payment of the penalty, upon payment of the stamp duty, provided it is done within twelve months after the making or issuing of the instrument.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that while, on the one hand, the interests of the Government are amply protected, we shall, on the other hand, get rid of that chronic absurdity of passing every year a remedial act which proclaims the absurdity of previous years' legislation. There is in this paragraph, which my amendment is intended to supersede, such a remedial act—a clause declaring that all deeds and instruments of every nature, heretofore made and not stamped, may be rendered valid by being stamped now. If it is right to do that, I should like the Committee of Ways and Means to tell me why it is not right to make some permanent provision that will save the necessity of this annual remedial legislation, some permanent remedy that will guard the people against frauds in designing and dishonest persons, while at the same time it will protect the Treasury against the violation of the stamp act.

Several instances have come to my own knowledge of the unjust operation of the law as it is; and let me say to the committee that what I offer is not an experimental proposition, but it is a proposition copied from the English law on this subject, which has been in force in that country for fifteen years, and which has been proved by experience to be both wise and beneficent.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Chairman, I was not able, by listening to the amendment, to understand it entirely. If it can be printed I should prefer that its consideration be postponed. Perhaps it may be passed over for the present.

Mr. MORRILL. The publication of the Globe is behind time, so that the amendment might not appear in it till we have got through the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I can only say, Mr. Chairman, that I am indisposed to the adoption of so voluminous an amendment, involving, as I understand, a pretty radical change of policy, on a suggestion made under such circumstances as exist at the time when this proposition is made. It should be understood that, however it may have worked in England, if you mean in this country to have the stamp act operative so as to produce a revenue, there must be a constant force applied to every person who is by law required to use stamps. I understand one effect of the proposed amendment to be this, that persons dealing together, having confidence in each other, receiving, for example, promissory notes from each other, may neglect the use of stamps; and if it happen, by the death of one party or by their falling out, that it becomes necessary to enforce the payment of those notes in court, they can then have the notes stamped and presented. They might go on for years using promissory notes without ever affixing stamps to them.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me, they are only to be stamped on payment of the penalty of fifty dollars.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If that be so, of course that is in a certain sense a protection to the Government.

Mr. THAYER. And then only stamped by a revenue officer who, according to the provision, is to make a minute on the margin showing the payment of the penalty.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But that does not obviate the difficulty that I suggest, that through years friends may use promissory notes, for example, without affixing stamps; and when the exigency comes they may go to the collector, pay the penalty, and have the notes stamped. The object of the Government and the necessity of the Government in reference to the stamp act is that there shall be a constant pressing necessity on every man to use stamps; and I fear that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] will work a laxity in that particular which will be injurious to the revenue. I for one shall be opposed to the amendment certainly, unless we can have time to consider it more than at present.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman state why these difficulties have not been developed through an experience of fifteen years in England, where this provision, precisely as incorporated in my amendment, has been enforced?

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] if the payment of fifty dollars will cure the defect after the expiration of a twelvemonth?

Mr. THAYER. Yes, sir.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. THAYER, and resulted—ayes 45, noes 33.

Not a quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Messrs. THAYER and MORRILL were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 35.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by inserting after the words "and such instrument, document, or paper, bill, draft, order, or note," in line eight hundred, the words "except instruments for the conveyance of lands and tenements." I only submit this proposition for the purpose of inviting attention to the question of how far it is within the power of Congress to determine in what manner and subject to what restrictions and limitations citizens shall be allowed to transfer lands. I think it is one of the gravest questions that ever forced itself upon the consideration of Congress. And, so far as I am informed, the courts before which this question has come have uniformly decided that Congress does not possess the power to regulate this matter, but that it is for the States themselves to determine in what mode the title to the lands within their respective limits shall pass; that it is not for Congress to say that an instrument not in a certain form shall be null and void. This is an assumption of very great power, and, to say the least, of very doubtful power; and for one, following the lead of the judicial tribunals of the country, I am in favor of creating an exemption, and limiting the exercise of this power to instruments that do not directly impair or interfere with the exercise of the legal sovereignty of the State.

Mr. THAYER. I think it will be very unwise to make any such exception as that proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] I do not see why instruments for the conveyance of that species of property, of all others, should be exempted from the payment of tax duties. I suppose those instruments would be one of the most prolific sources of stamp duty. Why they should be exempted from this tax I cannot conceive, particularly in view of the modification which has just been adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] that I am not calling in question the policy of imposing this tax by the Government if it can be properly done. The question is whether the Government of the United States may so far regulate the conveyance of lands within the limits of a State as to declare that to be null and void which according to the laws of the State is valid. Shall that be declared null and void even to the extent of affecting the validity of the title under that instrument?

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] questions the right of the Government to make any stamp law at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir. I say that you may impose any penalty you think fit; but do not say that in this particular mode alone shall land be conveyed, and in no other. If the judicial tribunals of the country that have spoken out upon this question can be relied on, you cannot defeat the validity of titles in this way. I do not know a single instance where this question has arisen that it has been held that the title is not valid. I know of a number of instances where the courts have held that this mode of rendering an instrument null and void, for the want of stamps upon it, is interfering with the rights of the States.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers upon the amendment.

Tellers were ordered.

Messrs. HOLMAN and THAYER were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THAYER. I propose an amendment which is absolutely necessary to make the section consistent with the amendment just adopted. It is to strike out in line seven hundred and ninety-eight the words "two hundred" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by adding at the end of line eight hundred and forty-seven the following words:

And by inserting in the proviso after the words "imported articles" the words "except lucifer or friction matches, cigar lights, and wax tapers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by inserting after line eight hundred and seventy-six the following:

That section one hundred and seventy-one be amended by inserting before the words "refined coal-oil" the words "crude petroleum or rock-oil" and after the words "all descriptions" by inserting the words "quicksilver, lucifer or friction matches, cigar lights, and wax tapers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HERRICK. I move to amend by inserting, after the amendment just adopted, the following:

That schedule B, preceding section one hundred and seventy-one be further amended by striking out the word "lease" in the proviso in the clause taxing mortgages, &c., and also by adding to said proviso the following:

And provided further, That upon each and every assignment of any lease, a stamp duty shall be required and paid equal to that imposed on the original instrument increased by a stamp duty on the consideration or value of the assignment equal to that imposed upon a conveyance of land for similar consideration or value.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by adding after line six, of section three, the following words:

And this section shall take effect from and after the passage of this act, anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by inserting after the word "pound" in line six, of section three, the words "payable in coin."

Mr. STEVENS. I trust that this amendment will not prevail. I had intended to move to amend by striking out in line eight the words "payable in coin." It is proposed that we shall now renew and perpetuate the error, which, as I think, the country is convinced was committed when we made our customs and the interest on our public debt payable in coin. I think that we ought not by any act of ours to depreciate further the currency. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to strike out "payable in gold until specie payment is resumed."

Mr. Chairman, I am happy to agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the remarks which he has made. We have pledged, so far as the faith of the Government is concerned, the payment of duties in gold. Here is a new pledge to tax the whole country to make everything payable in coin to those who have loaned money to the country. We have gone far enough in that direction—quite too far, in my judgment—and it is time to stop. The effect will be to aggravate the speculation in gold, because there would be an increased demand for gold; of course there would be increased speculation, and we would have still more the evil complained to exist so much in the gold markets of New York.

This is the beginning of a new policy which I do not think that this House will sanction. The honorable gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] will undoubtedly tell us, in order to produce effect, that the tax is to come from the cotton growers, and that we of the North cannot raise cotton. That I suppose will be his argument. But, sir, in fact it will come from the consumers of cotton goods, the wearers of cotton goods of all kinds. The consumers, in the end, are the persons who will have to pay the tax; upon them will come the duty of twelve cents per pound which is proposed to be levied at this time.

I do not think that the House is ready to adopt that new policy, or that the condition of the country calls for it. The present financial policy in the country, especially in the large cities, is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer; and the tendency of things is to roll up wealth in masses in the hands of the few and to make the poor poorer than they have been. The policy of the country is to make the few rich and to roll up money more and more into the hands of those who have securities payable in gold. We started wrong in the beginning when we authorized payment in coin, and instead of going further we ought to retrace our steps.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, if I did not believe that it was absolutely necessary to make this payable in coin I would not advocate it. I do not believe it is going to be a hardship any greater than the tax we have imposed already. At the present moment it is well known that cotton is being obtained at the South with greater facility than heretofore, and the effect has been a great reduction in price. The raw material and manufactured articles have gone down so rapidly that the cotton manufacturers who expected to make large fortunes did not make them. And if there is anything in the country which is an equivalent for coin it is cotton. If we have a surplus we can send it abroad and obtain coin for it at any moment. While we are issuing our bonds which may be converted into specie-paying bonds it is absolutely indispensable that we should fortify ourselves against the day when they are so payable. I do not want the Government to go into the market and be compelled to buy coin. I am for looking out in season to procure the coin. If peace shall come within a reasonable time this provision for the payment of the duty on cotton in coin will not be a hardship, because after peace we will resume specie payment.

Mr. BROOKS, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I thought this country had come to the conclusion that the system of making our interest and duties payable in coin had almost been the ruin of the nation, and would be if persevered in. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, says that it cannot longer continue. That we should not aggravate the evil by proclaiming, over and over again upon our statute-books, that our currency is constantly depreciating below coin, is to me amazing. The dealers in cotton have a hard enough time. Almost all the mills have stopped. I know that the three in my town have stopped. When you put this on, you aggravate the evil. If you compel the dealers to buy, the evil is as great as to compel the Government to buy, so far as raising the price is concerned. It makes no difference whether the merchant is bound to buy his hundred million a year to pay that duty, or whether the Government is obliged to buy it, so far as enhancing the value of gold is concerned. I thought that the whole country had come to understand that this policy should be no longer tolerated, and I am astonished now to find that it is persevered in with such chronic pertinacity.

Mr. KASSON. I would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, how he proposes to pay the gold interest upon the public debt without providing, either by a tariff or by an excise duty payable in gold, for the means of doing it. If the gentleman does not choose to answer, I must say it is the duty of this Congress either to repudiate the contracts of the United States, or else to provide the means in advance for meeting those contracts. For myself I am for always meeting them, at any cost, and at every hazard. Now, it is known that the gold derived from the payment of duties is being diminished from year to year and from month to month, and the question we have to meet is, how shall we guaranty beyond doubt the means to the Treasury to pay the gold interest upon the public debt when it matures? If it is probable that years hence the tariff duties may not be sufficient, there remain but two sources to do it: one by obtaining gold from the internal revenue, and the other by going into the market and purchasing gold for the Government of the United States. Which will we do? The gentleman from Pennsylvania argues that you are likely to enhance the price of gold by the imposition of a small duty upon the raw article of cotton. Are you not much more likely to enhance it by going into the market as a bidder to buy an unknown amount of gold for the express and inevitable purpose of paying the interest on the public debt in gold? It seems to me you increase the liability of that infliction by going into the market more than you will by requiring the parties to get the small amount of gold they need from day to day and month to month to pay the excise duty on cotton.

Again, look at the thing in a practical light. If you admit that you must get some gold from another source to pay the interest upon the public debt, observe the mode in which you get it in this case. Here are a hundred bales of cotton; five bales of that cotton—one twentieth of it—sent to a foreign market realizes the gold necessary to pay the excise duty upon the remaining ninety-five bales, because five per cent.—if you choose to put it at that, as I trust you will—one twentieth, is the excise duty you will be required to pay. I think, therefore, that the question resolves itself into the simple one whether you will take the article that is nearest to gold in itself, which, when sent abroad, becomes exchange like gold itself, and has a permanent value, permanent as anything can be, except gold itself, and realize a moderate excise duty in gold; or whether you will subject the United States hereafter to the necessity of going as a competitor into the gold market, either on the curb-stone or in the inner sanctum, to buy the balance of gold not realized from its tariff duties for the payment of this interest upon the public debt.

If it is conceded that this tariff realizes a sufficient amount, I would agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but if he takes the other alternative, and admits that it is not likely to realize that amount, and then should propose the remedy of repudiating the contract of the United States to pay its interest in gold, I differ with him and from the gentleman from New York, to to calo. I stand by the contracts of the United States, however unfortunate and menacing they may be to the Treasury of the United States. They must be complied with, cost what it will, either to the feelings of the Congress of the United States or to the pockets of the people of the United States. Then let gentlemen say one of two things: either that we have the means provided for paying in gold the interest on the public debt of the United States according to contract, or let them say that the existing means are sufficient to procure the gold with which to pay that interest. In either case I go with them to strike out this section. Unless, however, they say that, I insist that there is no mode in which to obtain the requisite gold revenue to meet balances required for the fiscal year 1866, and there is no means so adequate and convenient as levying this moderate excise duty of gold upon cotton.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know exactly what the speech of the gentleman from Iowa was based upon.

The CHAIRMAN. He was opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw my amendment; and now I move to amend by striking out the first word. The gentleman from Iowa need hardly have said that he would not desire to repudiate our contracts, or that anybody ever thought of it. I know of nobody in this country who has ever intimated that the contracts for the payment of interest in gold, as far as they have been made, shall not be faithfully performed; and those who argue otherwise, if they intend it as an insinuation, make an argument unworthy of themselves and unworthy of the cause that we are now discussing. Sir, if we have made a bad bargain we must stand by it; and everybody proposes to stand by it.

If the gentleman had examined the matter and spoken with that knowledge of the subject which he ought to have had he would have found that there was no necessity for this tax. The whole gold interest on the bonds of the United States issued up to the 1st of February (and all the bonds are issued that can be except a few millions) is but $63,000,000, all told. Our gold receipts last year, from customs, were $102,000,000; and after paying all our gold demands we sold gold at a premium, and realized over eighteen million dollars premium on gold. Now, sir, supposing our imports to fall off somewhat, no man can believe that our import duties next year will fall below seventy or eighty millions. The lowest calculation made by any of our financiers is $75,000,000. I believe the present Secretary of the Treasury thinks the receipts may possibly go down to $70,000,000. You will then have from seven to eight millions in gold more than will pay all the present liabilities, all the present contracts payable in gold. What I propose is, to stop short and issue hereafter no bonds the interest of which shall not be payable in the lawful money of the country. Stop this pernicious system, stop the advance of that commodity, and try to save the country from having to pay three or four times the value of the article.

Now, there is not the least necessity, unless you want to aggravate this evil, for imposing a tax on cotton payable in gold. The Government need not buy gold. It is true that the merchants will buy gold, and in that way the price will be raised just as much as if the Government bought it. But if we stop where we are there will be no necessity for buying a dollar in gold. We shall have more than we want. There is no doubt that our import duties next year will be eighty millions, and they will go on increasing till they range probably from eighty to a hundred millions.

As I said before, there is no earthly need of our raising a dollar in gold beyond what these import duties will produce, unless we are determined to pursue still further the practice of issuing gold-bearing bonds, which I trust no man is mad enough to favor. Sir, we are perplexing the manufacturers; and instead of having a gold market in New York only, we are to have one opened in every village and hamlet, on every waterfall where there is a spindle run by water-power. This difficulty is to be spread all over the country like a leprosy, and that, too, for the purpose of reasserting the principle which was wrong at the start, and which is more wrong the further we go. I do not wish to occupy any more time in arguing this point at full length. I hope that the committee will determine to reject the proposition.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, it will be recollected by the committee that the argument used especially by my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] has always been, "protect your home manufactures; raise your duties on foreign articles; and the domestic manufacture will then be able to control the American market." And now, when we are reaping the consequences of that system, namely, almost a cessation of foreign importations into this country, the gentleman argues to the committee that we are going to continue in the receipt of this large amount of duties upon foreign importations, precisely as if his former policy had not been as successful as he proposed that it should be. I maintain that that policy, to a certain extent, has been eminently successful in cutting off foreign importations to a degree which the committee may not, perhaps, readily appreciate.

The returns made since the close of the last fiscal year show an enormous diminution in the amount of foreign importations into the country, and consequently a great diminution in the tariff duties in gold derived from them. I hold the gentleman to his former logic, and I call the attention of the committee to the recorded fact that we are introducing a far less amount of foreign manufactures into the country than we were during the prior fiscal year. Is it the duty of statesmen to shut their eyes to that fact and say that because we received $102,000,000 in the fiscal year 1864-65 we are going to receive about the same amount in the fiscal year 1865-66? In my judgment, it is far otherwise. Our people have learned to depend upon home manufactures; it is cheaper for them to buy home productions. We have recently read in the money articles of the New York papers that the importers of these foreign manufactures were in great haste and eagerness to sell out even below cost for the purpose of realizing, discovering the very tendency of the market to which I call the attention of the committee to-day. And it is because this is the inevitable result of the policy advocated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania much more earnestly than ever I have advocated it, carrying it, in some instances, to an extreme which for myself I cannot and dare not sustain in the interest of the people of this country, and because Congress has adopted that policy, that it becomes necessary for us to guard the United States against the danger to which they are being exposed of being left without sufficient means in gold to meet the liabilities that they have assumed.

There is no difference between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself, it seems, as to the absolute necessity of complying with our contracts. To come back, therefore, to the question, "Will you get enough from your tariff duties in gold to meet this interest during the coming fiscal year and the months that immediately follow it?" In my judgment, we may do it; but it is a doubtful affair, a contingency to which we ought not to leave the Treasury of the United States, and I maintain, as I did before, that in consequence of this position it is our duty to provide always that the Treasury of the United States shall be strong in gold. I appeal to the metallic money men in this House to see to it that the Treasury of the United States always has gold and silver enough to meet the liabilities of the United States. Better have $40,000,000 too much than $5,000,000 too little. If we cannot have our paper redeemed by gold, let us have our contracts always characterized by abundant ability to meet them in gold and silver, lawful currency, at all times and in all epochs in the United States.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to insert after the word "coin" the words "or lawful money."

So far as I understand the policy and pledge of this country to the holders of the public debt it is this, that the duties upon customs shall be consecrated to this purpose and only to this purpose, and those who have subscribed and taken the public debt have subscribed with that understanding and that faith, that the revenue derived from customs should be consecrated to the payment of the interest upon the public debt.

Here for the first time upon an excise bill is introduced a proposition of this sort, and if we open the door to it who can tell where we are to stop? To-day the proposition is to lay an excise in specie upon cotton to pay the interest on the public debt; to-morrow it will be an excise in specie upon petroleum to pay the interest on the public debt; and the day after to lay such an impost on the hogs, grain, and cattle of the West and the hay of New England to pay the interest on the public debt. The public faith is pledged for no such purpose.

But the honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] tells us that the tariff is not likely to yield a sufficient revenue for that purpose. I tell the honorable gentleman from Iowa that the place to make the change is not in an excise bill, but should be made in a tariff bill. So arrange the tariff that it will encourage importations sufficient to provide for the interest upon the public debt; introduce a new tariff bill here, and do not begin this system of excise. There are many articles named in the tariff bill, a hundred of them, if I could take time to enumerate them, that are absolutely prohibited. It is such a tariff as ought not to exist. It is prohibitory in many articles of liquor; prohibitory in the simple article of spool-cotton, and in innumerable other articles. Now, the proper remedy for all that is to reduce this prohibition so that we can provide certain revenue for interest.

Mr. KASSON. The advantage of this excise duty in the present condition of public affairs is that our cotton, so far as we produce it now, must be used abroad. So far as the excise duty is raised upon cotton which is ultimately exported abroad, so far revenue is raised from citizens of foreign countries.

Mr. BROOKS. This excise is to be upon cotton at home.

Mr. STEVENS. It is news to me that we are exporting cotton except what is run out from rebel ports. I know that lately we have imported Surat cotton into this country.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly, because that does not compete with our cotton, but is mixed with it.

Mr. BROOKS. Then in order to obtain a small tax from foreigners, say on five bales, we are going to tax ninety-five bales for home consumption. In other words, because cotton has fallen just now in consequence of the fall of Savannah, we must impose a duty upon it so as to raise its price to what it was before we took Savannah. Now, that is just the plain English of this thing, and nothing more. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. MORRILL was then rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by striking out the words "payable in coin."

Mr. MORRILL. I trust the committee will not adopt that amendment. I feel myself that it is vitally important that we should reinforce the Treasury at this time in coin. When we are negotiating our securities at the rate of $8,000,000 per day, that may be converted two and a half years hence into securities payable in coin, it would show wisdom on our part I think to provide for securing this amount of coin in season.

And now, in relation to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] that there are a hundred articles upon which there is a prohibitory tariff; why, sir, unless we can keep the industry of this country employed at this time we cannot pay the interest of our indebtedness, either in coin or currency. It is absolutely indispensable that we should keep the people of this country at the present time fully employed. Although I have not advocated any such policy, still I am firmly convinced that it would be for the interest of the people of this country if we had a wholly prohibitory tariff until the end of this war.

I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will not be adopted. If it should be adopted, then we certainly ought to increase the duty upon cotton to at least double the amount now proposed.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The debate upon this amendment is closed.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I withdraw the amendment, and move to strike out the words "in coin." I agree with the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in one thing, that unless you can encourage the industrial interests of the country, and keep our manufactories going, the country must go down. And yet the gentleman is attempting by all the means in his power to crush the manufactories of cotton by putting a tax of from twelve to fourteen cents per pound more than there is now upon that article. As I said before, I do not know how it is in Massachusetts, but I do know how it is in our State, that some very large manufactories in my town have gone out of operation within one month, because of the high price of cotton.

Now, when there is some little chance of procuring this article, when we have already received some from the South, (it is idle to say that we are exporting it to any extent,) and when our people desire to revive the business, the gentleman would have us put our foot down and destroy the industry of the country. I cannot help thinking that the proposition advocated by my friend from Vermont is most inopportune, I will not say absurd, because that term will never apply to anything that my friend does. It looks to me monstrous.

I withdraw my last amendment, and renew the amendment to strike out the words "payable in coin."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer the following amendment:

In line six strike out "six," and insert "twelve."

In line eight strike out "five" and insert "ten."

Mr. KASSON. Would it not suit the gentleman's purpose equally well to strike out in lines six, seven, and eight the words "six cents per pound until the 1st day of July, 1866, and on and after that date a duty of," and then strike out in the eighth line the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten"? I do not see any necessity for the distinction of date.

Mr. MORRILL. I am not very particular in reference to the matter. These duties, in my opinion, should be increased; but I think that the soul of the amendment has already departed.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, let the body go with it.

Mr. MORRILL. I modify my amendment as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON.] I ask for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KASSON and Brooks were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move to amend, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "of" in the sixth line, to the word "which" in the eighth line, and insert "eight cents per pound," so that the clause will read, "a duty of eight cents per pound."

I make this motion because I think it must be evident that the Committee of Ways and Means, when they embodied in this bill a provision that this duty should be payable in coin, intended that the article of cotton should bear a heavier tax than five cents per pound. They anticipated, I presume, that five cents payable in coin would be equal to ten or twelve cents in currency. Now, sir, I am convinced that if we raise all that the committee anticipate by this bill we shall not raise as much as the wants of the country demand at this time. I have noticed that, as we have been progressing through this bill, we have not increased a single item of taxation proposed by the committee, while we have reduced many. I have been informed by members of the committee that they anticipate from all our revenue bills, this tax bill and the tariff bill, a revenue of about two hundred and eighty or three hundred million dollars, while our annual expenditures amount to about eight hundred millions.

Now, sir, I am in favor of this increase of taxation, notwithstanding it reaches the great mass of the people, because I believe it is the interest of the whole country that we should have our taxes come nearer than they do to our expenditures. We shall have to raise $50,000,000 by loan, or if we do not succeed in that we have given to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to eke it out by issuing interest-bearing notes, or certificates of indebtedness, which will, of course, inflate the currency, and the price of every article that the Government is compelled to buy, and every article that the citizen has to buy. We are multiplying the burdens upon the Government and the burdens upon the people just because we refuse to increase the taxes. Is it wise for the Government to go on in a policy which doubles and triples the cost of every article which the Government requires every day to carry on this war? Is that good policy? While you are doing that you are doubling and tripling the price of everything that goes into the consumption of every family in the country. I insist that we should tax more, and it would be for the interest of everybody. I believe that this is the only great Government that ever undertook in any great struggle to carry on war in this way, with revenues only one third or one fourth of the expenditure. I know that England, in her great continental war, raised every year by taxation three fourths of her expenditures.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Chairman, I have heard it said several times that the people are demanding taxation. I am in favor of raising revenue sufficient, if we can, for the wants of the Government; but I do not know that it is true that the people anywhere are demanding more taxation. We see every class of people everywhere evading the present onerous taxation.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he is not aware that he is going in direct contradiction to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY:] and I therefore caution him.

Mr. KERNAN. I leave my friend to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts. In my own district, taking the taxes for bounties and for the support of widows and families of soldiers, some of the farmers are paying twenty per cent. upon the assessed valuation of their farms. It ranges from seven per cent. to twenty per cent. upon the assessed valuation of their farms. They are paying taxes upon everything that they buy. While it is our duty to go on as legislators to try and raise revenue by adjusting the taxes as well as we can, yet it is true that we are taxing the people heavily by our State and national taxation. I have found none of those people who are crying out for more taxation by this House. We do not attempt to tax any interest but we have people coming up here and showing that it will burden them so much. I think that six cents per pound is as heavy a tax as this article can bear.

The committee divided on the amendment of Mr. MILLER, of New York; and there were—ayes 45, noes 40.

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MILLER, of New York, and KERNAN, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 52.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the following to come in as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the persons entitled to receive the same, under such regulations as he may prescribe, all sums of money which have been collected as a tax on the manufacture of molasses from sorghum under the act to which this is an amendment.

Mr. BROOMALL. I rise to a point of order. That proposes to make an appropriation, and is not germane to a bill to raise revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire, without entering into any argument on this proposition, to have read a communication from the chairman of the committee of agriculturists engaged in this department of business. It presents the case, I think, very fairly.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 14, 1865.

SIR: In the matter of remitting the duties collected on the products of sorghum cane, permit me, in behalf of the committees from the Ohio and the Maryland State Sorgho Associations, to invite your attention to the following points, which it is believed afford ground for the proposed relief:

The law was generally understood by operators to exclude products of sorghum and lupine from duty.

The inclosed printed copy of a ruling or decision under the law was widely published, confirming this opinion.

Agreements for making sirup were generally concluded, and in most instances the operations of the season were completed and settlements made before the circular of the Commissioner (printed copy inclosed) was seen by the parties interested.

The price for making sirup was low, predicated somewhat upon the cost the previous season, so that the unlooked for high price of labor and fuel did not enable operators to pay the tax without a loss on the business. Settlements having been made with owners, it was not practicable to recover the amount from them.

In many instances assessors construed the $600 clause as an exemption of fifty dollars monthly, and imposed the duty upon all above that amount made in each month. As the business is confined to one or two months, the exemption accorded was in such cases only fifty or one hundred dollars in place of $600.

Very respectfully,

WM. CLOUGH,
For Committee.

Hon. Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is agreed on all hands that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue made a mistake in imposing a tax upon this manufacture. It is conceded by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL], on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means. I insist that an interest now in its infancy, and which is becoming of vast and general importance, ought not to be oppressed by a decision utterly in conflict with the law. I hold in my hand a decision by one of the assistant assessors.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does the Commissioner adhere to that decision?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that he still adheres to it; and I understand from a gentleman well informed on the subject that he will not refund this money unless directed to do so by an act of Congress. The only chance then for the parties who paid taxes in violation of law is by legislation. I know of no instance where such manifest injustice has been done, and that, too, to an interest which ought to be encouraged rather than be oppressed. I hold in my hand the decision of an assessor under which many manufactures of this article were carried on. He says:

"A person who manufactures molasses from sorghum need not be licensed as a manufacturer, and the molasses thus produced is not subject to duty."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think myself that the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is a correct one in this case; but the evil of correcting it would be greater than that of bearing it. If we were to correct it in this case we should correct it in reference to maple sugar and cider. I do not suppose it was the intention of Congress to levy a tax upon either of those articles. If this amendment is adopted it will create the necessity of going back to every little small manufacturer throughout the whole country. It would require a vast amount of clerkship and labor in order to ascertain the exact amount which has been paid in order to refund it. I hope, therefore, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not be adopted. If we undertake in this instance to correct this wrong there will be no end to it.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to correct the statement of the gentleman from Vermont that it will be necessary to go into every district to refund to every manufacturer of this article; the gentleman is mistaken, because in some districts of country this tax was not assessed and collected at all. Therefore the action of the Government has been unequal. In some districts the manufacturer of sirup from sorghum has paid the tax, and in others it has not been collected. The gentleman from Vermont admits that it was not the intention of Congress to impose such a tax, and he further admits that the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is wrong. Now, if it is wrong, and these persons have been required wrongfully to pay the tax, the Government ought to refund it.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely expressed my opinion of the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but he may be right, and I may be wrong. The evil has passed away and no further difficulty is apprehended in that direction.

Mr. STEVENS. In my district no tax of this kind was collected. In my opinion this article of manufacture was excepted from taxation twice over in the law. When the assessor came around to tax that article I told him such was my opinion, and I told him to let the manufacturers go free of the tax and let them manufacture as much as they pleased, and if there was any trouble growing out of his action I would try to stand between him and any harm. He never collected the tax.

The question recurring on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment,

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were refused.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I propose to amend by adding the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That section one hundred and ten be amended by inserting after the words "1st day of July, 1864," the words, "Provided, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1865, in lieu of the rates of duty on deposits and on circulation prescribed by this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one tenth of one per cent. on the average amount of deposits of money subject to payment by check or draft, or represented by certificates of deposit or otherwise, and of one quarter of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person; and from and after the 31st day of December, 1865, a duty of one half of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of such circulation as aforesaid, except that banks which before the 1st day of July, 1865, shall have reduced their circulation since the 1st of January, 1861, to the extent of three quarters, shall be subject only on their remaining circulation to a tax of one twelfth of one per cent. each month. And whenever the outstanding circulation of any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, shall be reduced to an amount not exceeding five per cent. of the chartered or declared capital when the same was issued, said circulation shall be free from taxation. And whenever any State bank or banking association has been converted into a national banking association, and such national banking association has assumed the liabilities of such State bank or banking association, including the redemption of its circulation, or in case a national banking association shall become the owner or possessor of the assets of any State bank that has surrendered its charter or ceased to exist, or shall become liable for the redemption of the circulation of any State bank, such national banking association shall be held to make the required return and payment on such circulation outstanding, so long as it shall exceed five per cent. of the capital while it existed as a bank or banking association."

And further to amend by inserting before the words "nor to any savings bank" the words "nor to trust companies which shall receive no deposits subject to payment by check or draft."

Mr. GANSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MORRILL. For the purpose of closing debate?

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, no.

Mr. MORRILL. We have had debate enough on this point.

Mr. BROOKS. This proposition cannot be carried to-night.

The question being on the motion to rise,

Mr. GANSON withdrew it.

Mr. MORRILL. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] to withdraw his amendment at this time, and to offer it at the close of the bill to-morrow, when the House will be full.

Mr. HOOPER. I assent to that, and I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. A. MYERS. I move that the committee do now rise. I would like to start fresh in the morning on oil. [Laughter.]

The committee refused to rise; there being, on a division—ayes 32, noes 60.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause in the fourth section, as follows:

That in addition to the duties imposed in section ninety-four of the act to which this is an amendment, as hereinbefore amended, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, upon the goods, wares, and merchandise therein mentioned, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, an increase of one fifth or twenty per cent. of the duties or rates of duty now provided in said section, whether ad valorem or specific: Provided, That the additional duties or rates of duty herein mentioned shall not apply to coal illuminating oil, refined, and naphtha, benzine and benzole, paper of all descriptions, printed books, magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and similar publications, cotton, manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots.

And inserting in lieu thereof as follows:

That all persons licensed under the provisions of this act or of the act to which this is an amendment, and who are engaged in the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, or of articles produced or manufactured, whether foreign or domestic, shall, within ten days after the 1st day of each and every month, make return, under oath or affirmation, of the amount of goods, wares, and merchandise or articles sold during the month preceding, and shall pay thereon a tax of one half of one per cent.; and all such persons in the assessment and collection of the tax imposed by this section shall be subject to the provisions of law relating to the assessment and collection of taxes of manufacturers, mentioned in the eighty-second section of the act to which this is an amendment, as far as the same are applicable.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, is that amendment in order? The amendment in the section is to the ninety-fourth section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is to strike out and insert.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Chairman, the committee will observe that the section as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means proposes to levy an additional duty of one fifth, or twenty per cent. on the amount levied in the act of June 30, 1864, in the ninety-fourth section, including the amendment made in the present bill to that section, with the exception that the additional duty is not to apply to certain articles mentioned in the proviso to this section. The amendment which I propose is to substitute a tax of one half of one per cent. on sales made by persons licensed either as dealers or as manufacturers under the existing law. It is estimated at the Treasury Department that this tax on sales will yield, at one half of one per cent., $55,000,000.

I cannot agree with the gentleman who introduced and who has had charge of this bill, that the bill itself will furnish an amount of revenue equal to the existing exigencies of the country. With the deduction made by the amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in regard to the duty on malt liquors, I suppose that this bill cannot yield more than thirty-five or forty million dollars. The existing law, from the 30th of June last to the 31st of December, a period of six months, yielded a revenue of $98,000,000, including the extra income tax assessed for the year 1864. Therefore I cannot but believe that, notwithstanding the extraordinary receipts for the month of January and for the first fifteen days of the present month, the average for the last six months of 1864 is quite equal to the average that will be received under the act of June 30, 1864. And we are to take into account, still further, that by the reduction of the prices of the manufactures and products of the country, there will be a decrease of the revenue of the country corresponding to that decrease in prices; and although the return of prosperity that will be incident to the establishment of peace and to the acquisition of a supply of cotton will increase the demand for domestic manufactures, that increase of demand will not more than meet the deficiency due to the diminution in prices.

Therefore I am of opinion that we must provide greater revenue than is contemplated by this bill, and as the question of taxing sales has been discussed and considered from the very moment, I believe, that the internal revenue system was suggested to the country, and as there has been, as far as I know, a growing sentiment in favor of that species of taxation, I thought it proper to submit to the committee this amendment, which is simple, and, as I believe, can be easily executed, and will yield a large revenue. I believe that most persons would estimate it at $50,000,000. I do not propose to argue the matter further.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire only to put a few queries to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] in relation to the amount to be produced by this bill, as the gentleman is familiar with the various objects of the measure.

I would ask him, first, how much the revenue will be increased by the proposed tax of five cents per pound upon cotton?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the gentleman can tell me how much cotton we shall receive, perhaps I can solve that problem.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman is not prepared to give an answer to that question I will give one. It has been estimated by many parties that there are at the present time not less than six million bales of cotton in the South, notwithstanding all that has been burnt up; there are not less than four crops on hand, with the exception of what has been burnt up and what has been sent abroad. I do not estimate the amount myself to be more than four million bales.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is the highest estimate made by the Lancashire cotton-spinners, who, I presume, have better means of information than we have, that the stock of cotton on hand in the South is three and a half million bales. We cannot anticipate that we shall get all that so as to be able to tax it during the next fiscal year.

Mr. MORRILL. Nor do I expect that by any means; but I suppose that if we obtain access to the country, or if peace should be restored to the country, the annual production of the South, under any circumstances, will be not less than a million and a half of bales, which our tax-gatherers will reach; and if we reach no more than that, the million and a half bales will yield us, at five cents a pound, over $30,000,000.

Now, I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts another question. How much does he suppose the additional rates we have imposed upon incomes will increase the revenue of the country?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot say; but not exceeding $5,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL. It is estimated by the Department at $16,000,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman will consider the fact that the special income tax of five per cent. yielded from thirty to thirty-five millions, and that under this law we are to levy a duty of seven and a half and ten per cent. in certain cases. The difference cannot be very large.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee of the Whole have changed the minimum fixed by the Committee of Ways and Means from $3,000 to $5,000, and of course that will not produce quite as much as the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means would have done. But it would have produced, according to the estimate of the Department, if that change had not been made, $16,000,000.

I think they were wrong; I think it was too much. I never estimated it at over $10,000,000, and was rather disposed to believe it to be something under that, perhaps not more than $6,000,000.

But there is another question which I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, for I do not like to have our bill underrated or overrated. I desire to ask that gentleman how much he supposes would be realized from this fourth section of the bill which he proposes to strike out?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Last year the duties on manufactures yielded about $75,000,000. My estimate is that there would be about $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 due to this twenty per cent. That is, that under the existing law we should realize from $100,000,000 to $125,000,000, and that twenty per cent. of that would be from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL. That is sufficient for my purpose; taking it to be true that we can raise that amount by this section, then I would like to know of the gentleman how much he expects to realize by the adoption of one half of one per cent. on sales.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Perhaps $55,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL. Then he calculates that our sales will be $11,000,000,000. Now, I do not estimate the sales at any such enormous sum. Why, if we were to calculate that the whole business of this country would be duplicated, or triplicated, or quadrupled, and that we should realize upon every dime of it, it would not amount to one half of that sum. In my judgment the amount we would realize from this fourth section would be more than we would realize from the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend the amendment so that it will read "one per cent." instead of "one half of one per cent." I do this to enable me to say a word on the gentleman's proposition. I am puzzled to understand why the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] if he wishes to introduce the proposition he has submitted, should move to strike out another section which he confesses would furnish a very large amount of revenue to the Government. If, as he says, the whole bill will be inadequate to meet our wants, we then certainly should have not only his proposition, but the fourth section also. I do not know that he made the motion to strike out for any other purpose than to secure an opportunity to submit his remarks. If he was serious in his motion to strike out the fourth section it seems to me a very singular way of accomplishing what is clearly the object of all, the raising of money to supply the wants of the Government.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am perfectly willing to offer my proposition as a new section, and then the committee can deal with the fourth section as it pleases. I will move my proposition as an additional section, to immediately precede the fourth section as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should very much prefer that the fourth section shall stand, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] shall be offered as an additional section. But I wish to say a few words concerning the section proposed to be added. I have given what attention to the subject I have been able, and it is my opinion that the plan now submitted is less defensible as a mode of raising revenue than any I have ever heard in this Congress.

I believe I am right in saying that no writer on political economy of any considerable reputation has ever favored a tax on sales, at least within the last three centuries. The very best authorities in Europe and in this country denounce it as the most unequal and unjust of all the modes of taxation. The first great objection to it is that it clogs that free movement of trade which is so essential to national prosperity. It ties a fetter upon every article that should have full freedom of exchange in every place. Articles are exchanged only because by such exchange they can be made more valuable; that is, they will be put into hands that will increase the wealth of the nation. And now it is proposed that at the very point where the mobility of trade is most necessary a fetter shall be fastened to it to clog and impede its normal activity.

Again, this measure will tend to break down all the middle-men between the wholesale and the retail dealers. It will be particularly burdensome upon all persons who live away from large cities; particularly ruinous in its effects upon the smaller dealers who are engaged in trade in the West.

I hope that this Congress will not commit the folly of taking up a cast-off and exploded dogma, which has brought calamity to every nation that ever adopted it, and is not now the law of any civilized Government. I hope the sad experience of other nations will not be lost on us.

Mr. KASSON. What nation has adopted it and thrown it off in disgust?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am aware that Spain did it, and that the nature of the tax was worse than its amount.

Mr. KASSON. Has any nation, recognized as civilized in regard to taxation, ever adopted it and then rejected it?

Mr. GARFIELD. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it has been adopted successfully in any nation?

Mr. KASSON. In my judgment it has never been adopted in England, or Germany, or any European nation.

Mr. GARFIELD. And the best statesmanship of those nations has condemned it, and saved them from its evils. I trust the light of this century shining down upon us will keep us from such folly, and enable us to see a better path. I believe, sir, that the only solution to our financial difficulties is heavy taxation, but let us lay the burden upon the shoulders of industry rather than tie it to its ankles.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I think, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, that no nation has ever thoroughly tested this scheme or given it a fair trial. The gentleman from Ohio alludes to Spain. Spain, if I remember rightly, taxed from five to ten per cent. The tax was so heavy as to produce the result he states.

Mr. KASSON. It ran up to fourteen.

Mr. FRANK. The tax of one half per cent. now proposed is so light it will not be seriously felt, and I believe the people are entirely willing to sustain us in laying such tax.

I have conversed freely with many of the best business men of the country on this subject—Chittenden, Claflin, Lathrop, Ludington—all gentlemen of character, position, and influence, thoroughly loyal, and willing to pay cheerfully the large amount of tax that would be imposed on sales, amounting with some of the firms to more than one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. GARFIELD. Were they not wholesale dealers?

Mr. FRANK. The gentlemen named were; but I have also ascertained the views of others of all classes. I think, sir, the whole country is ready for this system of taxation, and that it will be more just than any other we have heretofore adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Chairman, I renew it.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is in error when he says no nation has ever succeeded in or fairly tried a tax upon sales, which he classes as belonging to a dark age, and not adapted for the enlightened day in which we live. So also is my colleague, [Mr. FRANK,] in his statement that this mode of taxation has not been tried. This nation has tried it with complete success. We are now collecting taxes upon the principle of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] It will be remembered that at the last session of Congress the Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill providing for a specific tax of fifty cents for every hundred shares of stocks, bonds, and other securities sold, and at the same rate per cent. upon sales of gold. This proposal was not acceded to by the House, but an ad valorem tax of one twentieth of one per cent. upon every hundred shares of stock sold was substituted.

No better illustration can be given, nor can a better argument be made, in favor of the proposed tax upon sales of merchandise and produce than the experience and result of this tax upon sales of gold and stocks. The receipts in one district in New York (the Wall street district) alone for November, December, and January, reached the enormous sum of $1,780,000. The specific tax of fifty cents proposed by the committee would have yielded but $178,000.

I have no hesitation in saying that no tax has been collected during the year that has been more cheerfully paid than what has been collected from the stock and exchange brokers of New York. I have authority in saying that none has been more easily ascertained and collected by the officials of the Government.

Experience has demonstrated its practicability. When the amendment now proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means shall become law taxing all sales of stocks and gold, whether bought on the account of brokers or on commission, I confidently believe, from the experience of the past year with this class of sales, that the Government can confidently rely upon the sum of $15,000,000 from sales of bonds and stocks alone.

The amendment proposed to tax sales, rather than to add to the taxes upon manufacturers, has my cordial, hearty approval. It has the sanction of the best-informed commercial men in the country, men whose interests will be most affected by it. It will have a more universal approval than any other system of taxation that has been adopted. I presented a memorial a few days since from the Chamber of Commerce of New York praying Congress to enact a law taxing sales.

The commercial press with but few exceptions have been for weeks past advocating this measure as just and equitable, bearing upon all classes equally alike.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs the House that he needs a larger revenue, and urges the subject upon us legislators to provide it. What is most needed is a system of taxation that will provide him with a certain revenue monthly paid into the Treasury, to enable him positively to anticipate a fund upon which he can rely to pay the soldiers and sailors of our Army and Navy their wages when due. It is a necessity that is upon us. We should meet it. The Army has not been paid for months. This is all wrong. Our defenders should promptly receive their small pay and be relieved from all anxiety growing out of the knowledge of the fact that their families at home are in poverty and want.

A tax upon sales will provide the funds needed monthly, and give to the Secretary of the Treasury the money required for this object. I sincerely hope this measure will pass the House with unanimity and become the law of the land.

Mr. KASSON. It will be recollected by the committee that at the last session of Congress this subject was proposed, somewhat incidentally, alike by the gentleman from New York and myself; and it was opposed, in respect to its application to sales of real estate, by my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] But when I saw placed upon our files an amendment embracing this subject, to be proposed by my friend from Vermont, I thought at last the good day had come when this system might be adopted even with his approval.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say to the gentleman that had he been present when I gave notice that at the proper time I should offer that amendment, he would have understood that I proposed to introduce that amendment and one other, as a matter of courtesy to some of my colleagues on the committee, of whom he was one, but with no intention of advocating it myself. He would also have noticed that I urged such arguments against it as I could in my opening speech.

Mr. KASSON. I regret that my first impression was not correct. I still have some hopes that in the progress of events he will reach the position of the public opinion upon this subject at this time.

Now, sir, I wish to say a single word upon this subject before the committee rises and the House adjourns, and it is this: that so far from taking into consideration the precedent of Spain upon this subject, I hold always that the just and statesmanlike legislation of this country is derived from the course of business and the current of public opinion among our own people. There is no system of public affairs in Europe like our own; none in which the course of business is conducted in accordance with the convenience of the people as in this country. And when my friend from Ohio says we propose in this way to embarrass the transactions of trade, I ask him why we do not embarrass it when we put a tax upon the income of the man derived from this very property? You do not tax the article sold, or because it is sold, but you just take the data which his sales furnish, and you say that one half of one per cent. shall be paid to the Government upon the amount of such sales. Certainly gentlemen know that in the great mass of business transactions of this country there is none in which the seller would not make a bargain with an agent for effecting a sale of more than one half of one per cent. He occasionally employs drummers or agents on a commission of two or two and a half per cent. to effect sales for him to purchasers which such agents may find in the market.

When, therefore, you levy a light tax like this, you do not embarrass trade at all, but simply take a portion of the profits which the trader derives, and in that way you make the tax more equal than you can in any other way. Sales are made for profit, and not for a loss; and you simply reserve from the profits a small portion thereof. And do you destroy the middle-man in that way? Where is the middle-man that is destroyed by the addition of one half of one per cent. upon the profits of sales he effects? Bring the matter to the test of practice, bring it to the test of the business of any man you have in mind, and you will find that it amounts to this, that no man conducts business on a margin of one half of one per cent. profits. If you did destroy the middle-man, you would only diminish the revenue, but it would not harm the people of the country. If the middle-men went out of existence that would not harm the people, but rather benefit them. Its only effect would be to cheapen the consumption to the people.

But I have already shown that in point of fact it could not have the effect of driving the middle-man out of employ by any legitimate consequence of the act. I cannot, at this time of night, enter generally into a debate upon this subject. I wished to say this much, that when the committee come together again they might have the views I have entertained for two years upon this subject before them.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. COFFROTH, (at ten minutes past ten o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned until eleven o'clock, a. m., to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 17, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. D. H. MULLER, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

SENATOR FROM VIRGINIA.

Mr. WILLEY. I present the credentials of Hon. JOSEPH SEGAR, Senator-elect from the State of Virginia to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Lemuel J. Bowden. I move that the credentials be read and placed on the files, and that the oath of office be administered to Mr. SEGAR.

The Secretary read the credentials.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator—

Mr. SUMNER. I move that those papers be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLEY. I trust that will not be done. I know of no reason why it should be. The credentials, I believe, are proper on their face. They come to the Senate in due form under the seal of the State of Virginia. The gentleman who comes here is accredited the successor of Hon. Mr. Bowden, who died while a member of this body. Mr. Segar appears here to take his place and to supply the vacancy occasioned by his death. I see no more propriety in referring these credentials to the Judiciary Committee than I would have seen in referring the propriety of Mr. Bowden himself (if he were now living) retaining his seat on this floor. If Mr. Bowden was entitled to a seat upon this floor, I suppose this gentleman would be entitled to take his seat as his successor provided the credentials be all regular and correct; and I know of no objection to them. I trust therefore that this subject will not be referred, particularly at this late period of the session. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COWAN. I hope that reference will not be made. I think it is a very extraordinary step indeed. It seems to me this question is res adjudicata. We have proceeded on that idea up to the present time, and it seems to me that no sufficient reason has been presented why we should change our policy now. I beg Senators to pause before doing so. If this Union is ever to be restored in the world it must be by the means which are now presented to us for our consideration. If we are to wait until the whole of a State is under our dominion and until all the people of a State are heard from, such a restoration will never take place, never. In my judgment we must establish State governments in those States that have been disturbed by the rebellion, and make them a nucleus around which the loyal population may rally. Let us encourage and strengthen them until in the course of time they extend over the whole State. I shall be exceedingly sorry if these States are to be rebuked and repulsed and driven away when they are desirous to do all they can for the purpose of effectuating the very end for which this tremendous struggle has taken place. There was no such objection as this made when the predecessor of Mr. Segar presented himself here. When he came and claimed his seat he was allowed to take it, as other Senators were. I think it would be making an invidious distinction if we now pursue a different course on this question. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will allow the person who has been properly accredited to take his seat as a Senator.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator whether Mr. Bowden presented himself here as a Senator from Virginia before or after the vote taken on the admission of West Virginia.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know how that was; perhaps it was before.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWAN. However that may be, I think it is clearly our policy now, instead of repelling these efforts on the part of the loyal men of the States in rebellion to have themselves represented here and to form State governments, to encourage them by all means.

Mr. FOSTER. The simple reference of these credentials to the Judiciary Committee will merely, as I suppose, charge that committee with inquiring whether the credentials are in due and proper form. So far as I know, that would be all the duty with which the committee would be charged by the mere reference of the credentials. If that presents all the question there is in the case, and there be a question on the credentials, this motion is right and proper; but I am not aware that there is any question as to the credentials themselves; and a report from the committee showing that the credentials are in due and proper form will not, as I believe, settle any question which divides the members of the Senate at this time. It seems to me that if a motion is made to refer the credentials, there should be an additional motion along with it, or that motion alone is almost useless, for I suppose nobody questions but that the credentials themselves are in the usual and proper form. A report from the committee that that fact is so would not advance us at all upon the question which, I suppose, divides the Senate. I see no propriety, no necessity, for sending the credentials merely to the Committee on the Judiciary when no question arises on those credentials.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not quite agree with the Senator from Connecticut as to the effect of a reference of the credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary. I suppose, if that reference be made, it will be the duty of the Committee on the Judiciary to ascertain whether these credentials come from a proper source. A public meeting might be held in the city of Washington, or in the State of Connecticut, or in the State of Illinois, and make out a credential in proper form to A, B, or C, as a Senator, and I suppose on the reference of such a credential the committee would inquire whether that public meeting had any authority to elect a Senator.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask the honorable Senator, with his permission, whether, if the credentials were in proper form and under the seal of a State, the committee would not be bound to take those credentials as they stood; and if the motion was simply to refer them to the committee, whether the committee could inquire whether the names were forged or the seal forged or anything of the sort; whether the seal would not prove itself, and whether the document would not, under those circumstances, on its face be the evidence for the committee, to which they would be confined?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend not by any means. I suppose the members of the Senate are to take judicial notice of what is the Legislature in a State, of who is Governor of a State; and I suppose that if a credential was signed by A, B, and it was brought to the notice of the committee, or the committee of their own knowledge had notice, that A, B was not Governor of the State, or that no such Legislature had convened as purported to have made the election, they would report that fact to the Senate.

Let me suppose a case. It is known to every member of the Senate, I presume, in a way that he is bound to take official notice of the fact, that the Legislature of the State of Connecticut convenes at a certain time under the constitution of that State; and it is known to every member of the Senate, as a fact of which he is bound to take official notice, that at the present time there is no Legislature in session in Connecticut. Knowing these facts officially, (for I think we are bound to take notice of certain acts of the States,) if a certificate should be presented here showing the election of a person from that State to the Senate of the United States in the month of February, 1865, it would be the duty of the committee to whom such credentials might be referred to report to the Senate the fact that no Legislature was in session in the State of Connecticut in the month of February, 1865.

I express no opinion as to the right of this party to a seat; but I think that it is very proper, in the condition of things which we know to exist in the country, that these credentials should be referred before the claimant is permitted to be sworn as a member of this body; and I think the reference of the credentials will bring up the question as it did in regard to Arkansas. In the case of persons claiming seats in this body from Arkansas a year ago, there was no objection to the credentials; they were in proper form; but the Senate proceeded to consider whether the body which undertook to elect them to the Senate was the Legislature of the State. The Constitution declares that this body "shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof;" and when credentials are referred, it is competent to inquire whether the Legislature of the State has made such an election.

We have made that inquiry frequently since I have been here. It arose in reference to the State of Indiana a few years ago, the question being whether the body which elected certain Senators was the Legislature of that State. It arose also in reference to the first election of my friend from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN,] whether the body which elected him was the Legislature of the State of Iowa. The Senate, wrongly as I think, decided in that case that the body which elected him was not the Legislature of the State of Iowa, and he was sent back and reelected afterward. This is an inquiry that has been often made in this body; and I think that when the credentials are referred, something more is to be considered than simply whether on the face of the paper it purports to be the election of a Senator or not. I trust that the credentials will be referred.

Mr. HOWARD. I trust, sir, this reference will be made. For one I am very anxious that the Senate should make an examination not only into the authenticity of the credentials themselves presented before us, but that they should go fully and thoroughly into the question of the right of Virginia, I mean old Virginia, to be represented in this body at this time. I think that is a question upon which not only we but the whole country need to be enlightened. I shall be very much obliged to that committee, should the reference be made, if they will furnish to the Senate and the country a succinct history of all the proceedings which have resulted in the election of the gentleman who now presents his credentials. If I understand it rightly, the constituency which this gentleman will claim to represent in this body is now in a state of insurrection and rebellion against the United States; that constituency as a political community are the enemies of the United States, and at war with the United States; and I desire particularly that the Committee on the Judiciary shall furnish to us, if they can furnish some argument to show that a political community at war with the United States has a right to be represented in this body or in the other House of Congress, and thus to enjoy the political privileges which belong to States that are at peace and performing their duty to the Government. I wish a full, free, and ample report not only upon the question of fact so far as it relates to the authenticity of these credentials, but to the right of the community now called "Virginia" to be represented here. I am very much inclined to deny the right of that community to any representation upon this floor, and am embarrassed not only about the right but also the matter of the election of this gentleman and his colleague, if he has a colleague, to this body. When and where did it take place, by whom was it made, under what statute, under what constitution, in short, quowarantur generally was this whole thing done? I think it is due to the Senate from the committee, if these credentials shall be referred to them, to furnish full and ample information on all these topics. I hope, therefore, as the question is one of magnitude, as it is likely to furnish a precedent of great importance for the future, that the committee will welcome this reference and perform their duty fully and amply on it. I look upon this as a question of the utmost importance.

Mr. SUMNER. I regret that a question of this magnitude has been precipitated upon the Senate at this late period of the session when there is so much public business which has not yet received the attention of either House of Congress. The Senator from Michigan does not exaggerate its magnitude. Sir, it is much to be a Senator of the United States, with all the powers and privileges pertaining to that office—powers and privileges legislative, diplomatic, and executive; and the question now is whether all these extraordinary powers and privileges shall be recognized in gentlemen whose certificate has been sent to the Chair. I thought it my duty, on hearing that certificate read as I entered the Chamber, to move at once its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. I am astonished that there can be any hesitation in making that reference. Sir, Senators who hesitate show an insensibility to the character of the question. Is the Senate ready to act blindfolded or with the eyes open? I insist that on a question of this magnitude the Senate shall act with the eyes open, wide open; and I know no other way in which they can be brought to act so except through the intervention of a responsible committee of this body. Therefore, sir, I proposed that the credentials should be referred to that committee. It will be the duty of the committee, as my friend from Michigan has suggested, to consider in the first place whether a State in armed rebellion like Virginia can have Senators on this floor. That is a great question, constitutional, political, practical. It will be their duty, then, to consider in the next place whether the gentleman whose credentials have been presented has been chosen legally under the Constitution of the United States by any State. Now, sir, I do not intend to prejudge either of these questions. I simply open them now for the consideration of the Senate.

I say, sir, I do not mean to prejudge these questions; but I do insist that a measure of this importance shall not be acted on without due consideration, and in absolute indifference to those facts which now stare us in the face, glaring upon us every day in every newspaper that we read. Sir, you cannot be insensible to facts. It is in vain that Senators say that Virginia, now in war against the Union, is entitled to representation on this floor, when you have before you the inexorable fact that the greater part of that State is at this moment in the possession of an armed rebellion, and when you have before you the other fact filling almost all the newspapers of the land that the body of men who have undertaken to send a Senator to Congress are little more than the common council of Alexandria; and you have the question distinctly presented to you whether a representative of the common council of Alexandria is to enter this Chamber and share the same powers and privileges of my honorable friend near me, the Senator from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,] or my friend further from me, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] I merely open these points without now undertaking to decide them, but simply as an unanswerable argument in favor of the reference to the committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am glad, Mr. President, that we are furnishing evidence every day that we are a progressive people. We are learning something. These points, however, have not been presented to-day for the first time. I recollect that when my friend before me [Mr. WILEY] and my other friend who is now absent from his seat [Mr. CARLILE] applied for admission to this body as Senators from the State of Virginia, a few of us, a small corporal's guard, objected (not on account of any personal dislike to those honorable members) to their being admitted as members of this body, because we contended then that the Legislature of the State of Virginia had not sent those gentlemen here. We thought that the State of Virginia then was at war with the Government of the United States, and we thought that Senators professing to represent a State should in fact represent the sovereignty of that State.

So, sir, it is too late for any member of this body to say that he opens these points now. They were opened years ago, and to my amazement, if I could be amazed at anything transpiring either here or elsewhere in the country, I find some of those who were then most zealous for admitting the honorable Senators who claimed to represent the State of Virginia here, now most vehement in their opposition to the admission of the new Senator.

I do not intend to express an opinion on this matter. I think the credentials ought to be referred. It will be time enough to express an opinion whether the gentlemen who profess to act as the Legislature of Virginia are nothing but the "common council of Alexandria" when we shall have the report of the committee. I only rose to say that every day's experience demonstrates the fact that we are progressing, and progressing most rapidly.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, there is what is popularly known as "the Congressional burying-ground." There they bury bodies. There are other burying-places where they bury bills and resolutions and propositions; many have been buried within my own knowledge; the Senator from Massachusetts knows that I have some experience of that kind. To refer this proposition to the Committee on the Judiciary is to bury it; and there has been no resurrection proclaimed for any such thing.

I object to the reference. I am prepared to meet the question in the face. I have my impressions, and I am prepared for the discussion. It is a grave matter; and I say the Senate is as well prepared to discuss and dispose of it now as it will be at any time, and it may as well be done now. The State of Virginia is, according to the philosophy of our Constitution, as I understand it, a State in this Union. We have certified to us, under the great seal of the State, the fact that a certain person has been elected Senator from that State. It is my impression that that gives him the right to take the oath of office. I do not say that is conclusive as to his right to a seat here; but I say we want no burial of this proposition in the arms of a committee where the vaults are so deep that the sun never lights them and no sound reaches them.

Mr. FOSTER. When I was up before I simply suggested that it did not appear to me that the question in the case would be raised on a simple reference of these credentials. I think so now. No gentleman has suggested that on these credentials any question but their due legal form arises, except the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] who cites cases that have been previously referred on credentials and considered on credentials. He has referred to the case of the State of Indiana. I think that was the only case named where questions of that sort had been made on credentials; but in that case there were remonstrances against the Senators who applied under those credentials, and allegations that they were not duly elected, and those remonstrances, together with the credentials, were referred to the Judiciary Committee, and that brought up the question. So far as my recollection or experience in this body is concerned, there has been no reference of credentials where any question was involved respecting the right of the members to seats, unless with the reference of the credentials there was an instruction to the committee to inquire into the other matters which were in controversy touching the right of the members to be admitted to their seats; and if the credentials were in due and legal form, these extraneous matters were always connected with the credentials in the reference, in order that the whole question might be investigated.

Now, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] speaks of this as a mighty question, and he says that persons who do not perceive that it is a mighty question are insensible to its greatness. I agree with him that it is a great question, and I certainly am not to be charged with overrating it when I suggest that the question is too mighty to be raised on the simple credentials. He speaks of the credentials as a certificate to enable a man to sit here. By what else does the honorable Senator sit here, except by what he calls a certificate? He refers to the honorable Senator from New York, and to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. By what other tenure do they hold their seats here except a certificate, if the honorable Senator chooses to call it so? How does the certificate of either of those Senators differ from this? It has the seal of the State sending the Senator, certified by certain officers. If this has the same, what is the difference?

Mr. SUMNER. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. I know he will appreciate my motives. The Senator refers, for instance, to myself as a Senator from Massachusetts. Suppose it was matter of public notoriety that I came into this Chamber with a certificate from a body of men in Boston, little more in number and character than the common council of that city, by public report not in fact supposed to represent the State; suppose that that was a fact much received in the country; then I submit to the Senator whether it would not be the duty of the Senate before receiving my credentials to inquire into their origin.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly. I agree most decidedly in the case put by the honorable Senator that such would be the duty of the Senate; but if, in that state of facts, the honorable Senator came here with credentials verified according to the usual forms, signed by the Secretary of State of the State of Massachusetts, with the seal of that noble Commonwealth attached to the instrument certifying that the honorable Senator had been duly elected a Senator in the Congress of the United States from such a date to such a date, and that credential was in due and proper form, I submit with great confidence that on merely referring that document to the Judiciary Committee no such question as the honorable Senator suggests would be raised before that committee or before the Senate. The committee would be charged with the duty of examining that document; and finding that certificate (if the honorable Senator thinks that the proper term) in due and legal form, they would say so to the Senate, and having said that they would say no more unless they traveled out of the record to investigate the point whether the honorable Senator had been duly elected by the Legislature of his State, or by the common council of the city of Boston, or some other body not authorized by the laws and the Constitution of the country to elect a Senator. In order to raise that question it should be sent to the committee to inquire; it would not arise merely upon the reference of the document itself. That is all I say.

I trust I go as far as the Senator in standing at the door of this body to inquire by what right members come in, and if they come without authority in saying that they shall not be allowed seats here. The only point between us is the suggestion which I have made, and what is that? The honorable Senator from Michigan says he wants to be informed as to the relation of the State of Virginia to the United States, and other matters therewith connected. I simply suggest with great confidence that none of those questions arise on the simple reference of the credentials, but that there should be some motion to instruct the committee to inquire over and above and beyond the credentials, for the great question here does not arise on the credentials. I do not underrate the question in point of gravity or importance.

As a member of the committee to whom this subject was about to be sent if no objection was made, I did not see that we should either act beyond the credentials when we were not called upon to act beyond them, or that we should report simply upon the form of the credentials when it is expected something more should be done. If something more ought to be done, it seemed to me the committee should be instructed to do more; and that something more ought to be done seems on all sides to be agreed. All I wished was that the very questions which the honorable Senator from Michigan suggested should be sent to the committee for investigation and report; and I confess it seems to me it would be much simpler and better to charge the committee to perform the duty which is expected of them rather than that they should assume it when they are not charged with it.

Mr. HOWARD. I am not able to concur with the Senator from Connecticut in the view he takes of the duty which will devolve upon the committee in case of this reference. It seems to me that the reference would necessarily imply an instruction from the Senate to the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the election, return, and qualifications of the claimant to a seat in this body. As I understand it, such is the great object of the reference, and that the reference is not confined simply to the inspection of the seal impressed upon the parchment or paper which comes here as the credentials of the claimant. It seems to me the duty of the committee goes beyond the formality of a mere seal having upon it the effigies of Virginia and the old motto of the Old Dominion, "Sic semper tyrannis." Would the Senator from Connecticut ignore the fact that under an act of the Congress of the United States and the proclamation of the President, old Virginia, and the whole of it, is declared to be in insurrection against the United States, and as a community at enmity with them? He would ignore this most important fact according to his construction. He would forget entirely that there are now standing upon the soil of the Old Dominion half a million of armed men, testing the question whether that old Commonwealth shall belong to the United States or to the counterfeit confederacy instituted by the rebels. It strikes me that that fact is one of some little significance, one not to be lightly treated, and one in the face of which we may well recoil from suffering her to be represented in this Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I should like to ask him a question right there, not to interrupt him. I should like to ask him whether, if such be the relation between the State of Virginia and the United States, the Senate is not ignoring that condition of things when they admit a man to come into the body, sit here by courtesy, present his credentials, recognize those credentials as proper credentials, at least so far forth as to receive them and refer them to a committee without one word of comment? In what position do the Senate of the United States place themselves on this question if they do that?

Mr. HOWARD. My object, Mr. President, is a very simple one. I wish to ascertain, with clearness and precision, by what authority this claimant comes here and presents himself as entitled to a seat in this body. The old State of Virginia is at war with the United States. This is not denied by the Senator from Connecticut. Can he stand up in his place and say to the Senate that a community hostile to the United States is entitled to participate in the legislation of the United States, either by a Senator or by a Representative?

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator will allow me just there, I ask if the Judiciary Committee of the Senate would not be bound to recognize the relation of the State of Virginia if the Senate receive a document purporting to come from that State, as a State, and sent to us for examination?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir; the committee, like other members of the Senate, are obliged to take notice of all public facts. They are obliged to take notice of the fact that the President, under an act of Congress, has declared the State of Virginia to be in insurrection against our authority. They would be obliged to go further, and inquire whether that proclamation has ever been withdrawn or in any way modified; whether peace has been restored to the State of Virginia; and if so, by what means and whose authority? It seems to me that this question is really incapable of argument. To say that a community at war with us, every energy of which has been brought to bear in the prosecution of a wicked and rebellious war against us, is entitled to be represented in the Senate, is to me just as great an absurdity as it would be to insist that a foreign country with whom we are at war is entitled to the right of sending Senators and Representatives here to participate in our legislation.

Why, sir, suppose a very small portion of the inhabitants of South Carolina, huddling together under an oak or a pine tree, in some remote nook of that chivalrous Commonwealth, should see fit to elect members of the Senate, and should by some legerdemain get possession of the seal of the old Commonwealth of South Carolina, or suppose the rebel governor himself should see fit to impress upon the credentials the seal of that ancient community, and the paper should be brought here and laid before the Senate; according to the Senator from Connecticut, all the inquiry the Committee on the Judiciary would have to make upon that subject would be as to the authenticity of the ancient seal, and that they would not be required to pass upon the question of the right of this usurping legislature.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry to trouble the Senator, but I would like to ask him a question just there. If an individual should come here offering credentials as a member of this Senate from a foreign country, Upper or Lower Canada for instance, would he receive them and move that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. HOWARD. Not at all; and if I could have my way I should not receive the credentials presented here; but I understand they are already in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. Then why did not the Senator object to their being received? If we are in a state of war with Virginia, why did he not object to the credentials being received? If they are received, on what grounds are they received? If they are received, it is because it is the judgment of the Senate that it is right and proper to receive them. I ask again, if the Judiciary Committee would not be bound by that fact, and have to look at nothing but the credentials referred to them, whether they were in due and legal form or not?

Mr. HOWARD. In answer to that I can only say that my attention was not given to the subject at the time these credentials were presented, and like many other members of the Senate, and I dare say a large majority of the Senate, I was taken entirely by surprise by the fact that the credentials were laid before us.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not move to have them rejected instead of having our records at all embarrassed by them? It is perfectly in order so to move.

Mr. HOWARD. It would be in order; and so it is to have them referred.

Mr. FOSTER. Not if they come from a foreign country.

Mr. HOWARD. Why not?

Mr. FOSTER. Because it is a question not to be entertained by the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. When I spoke of a foreign country, I meant to say in a very emphatic manner that credentials produced from such a source could not be entertained; that they would be of no validity; that they would be proceeding from a public enemy; but no more a public enemy than are the people of Virginia to-day, as has been decided more than once by the Supreme Court of the United States. But in order that no excuse shall be left to the Senator from Connecticut and those who may think with him, I shall move to amend the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts by the addition of these words:

And that the committee be instructed to inquire and report upon the election, return, and qualifications of the claimant.

I do this, not because I suppose it to be necessary, for I think all that is implied in the simple motion to refer the document to that committee, but for the purpose of ascertaining specifically, and in an authentic form, by what right it is that this legislature in Virginia have assumed to appoint a Senator of the United States and to send him here. Sir, this is no trifling subject. It is one of the utmost importance. The gentleman who presents himself here to-day with these credentials claims the right to vote in this body and to participate in the enactment of our laws. Have the United States such a power over Virginia as to enable her population, even if they were disposed, at this time to elect a Senator? Are we collecting any revenue from that State? Are there a majority of the people of that State who are loyal to the Government of the United States, and as such now acting in pursuance of their duty? No, sir; nothing of the kind. It is to my mind, as I remarked before, just as absurd to think of introducing a Senator from such a community into this body as it would be to introduce a Senator from a foreign country with which we should be at war. Sir, we have paid too dear, we have paid a little too much money, we have poured out a great deal too much blood in resisting the progress of this rebellion and in our efforts to reclaim Virginia to her ancient loyalty to be trifled with in this way. Let the loyalists of that State, let the whole people of that rebel State, and of all other rebel States understand, once for all, that we are not to be trifled with, nor humbugged by the introduction here of members of Congress and Senators in Congress without constituents and without States to represent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary in regard to the point suggested by him.

Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to say that I shall vote for the motion of my colleague and also for the amendment if it is pressed. But in doing so I wish to say that, while I hope they will make a thorough investigation and report, I understand this question to stand in this way: the Congress of the United States recognized a political government in Virginia, or a portion of it, as the State of Virginia proper. On the strength of that recognition men were admitted into this Senate and into the other House. On the strength of it we made West Virginia a State and brought her into the Union, and she is in the Union to-day. It seems to me, therefore, that we are bound by all our votes during the last three years to consider the Governor and Legislature of Virginia as existing.

As regards the proclamation of the President, so much of Virginia as was not occupied by our forces was declared in rebellion; but that portion of it held or to be held by our armies was not declared in rebellion; and the moment a square mile of Virginia is occupied by our armies, by the very terms of the proclamation it is no longer in rebellion. The great part of Virginia is at war with the Government of the United States, and at war with the State government of Virginia precisely as much as it is at war with the Government of the United States. These rebels are at war with Governor Pierpoint and the Legislature that has sent this gentleman here who claims a seat, just as much as they are at war with Mr. Lincoln and the Congress of the United States. I am willing to have this question examined, because I think the committee ought to examine it and ought to report the facts; but my understanding of the facts is as I have stated; and unless something is shown to the contrary, I feel bound to recognize Governor Pierpoint and the Legislature and the political government of the old State of Virginia.

Mr. COWAN. I wish to ask the honorable Senator a question: whether he has any doubt, or anybody has any doubt, of the facts he has stated as being existing facts; and whether, if they are existing facts, they are not as well known to us now as they can be by the investigation of the committee? That is one of the best reasons why it ought not to be referred.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say in reply that my own information leaves me no doubt about it. I have none in my own mind; but there are Senators who have, and I have no doubt honestly so. I am therefore willing that it shall go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and let them report the facts of the case; but unless they can show something contrary to what seems to me to be all our action, all our legislation, all the action of our Government, executive, legislative, or judicial for three years and a half, the political organization that has sent Mr. Segar here is as much the political organization of the State of Virginia as the Legislature of any other State in this Union.

Mr. WILLEY. I am under great obligations to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] for his kind and patriotic remarks. He seems to appreciate and to have a proper sympathy with the men in the border States who are standing up as the bulwarks between the ravages of the foe and the loyal States further north.

I am very well aware, Mr. President, that it is late in the session, and I am aware of the impatience of the Senate to prosecute the business before it. I shall not trespass long upon the patience of the Senate; but I think it proper that I should make a remark or two before the vote is taken upon this proposition.

I was sorry to hear the remark of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner] in regard to the Legislature at Alexandria. It will do very well for Senators surrounded by loyal populations, far from the scene of strife, far from the field of battle, far from the torch of the incendiary, far from the bloody knives of the guerrillas, to throw slurs upon the loyal organization of the men of the border seeking to establish themselves as parts of this Government.

Sir, who are the Legislature of Virginia? Nothing more, according to the Senator, than the common council of Alexandria. Why, sir, they represent to-day a population of two hundred and sixteen thousand loyal people; and the representatives of this people, standing in the breach between the foe and our friends, baring their breasts to the shock of battle, and to the terrible inflictions of this horrible war, are to be impeached as a poor, meager organization with no more political standing than the common council of Alexandria! I think the honorable Senator took more of the excitement of the moment than of his sober reflection. I had hoped to see him extending the hand of friendship and favor and support to the struggling loyal people of the South. Instead of that we are to be met with repulse. I was sorry to hear the remarks of the Senator.

But the honorable Senator and those who think with him have taken the ground that Virginia is not entitled to representation on this floor. Why, sir, has not the Senate recognized the fact that she is entitled to such representation during the whole of the session and during the whole of the last session of Congress? Has there not been a Senator representing the State of Virginia on this floor, participating in the proceedings of this body, recording his yeas and nays, and to the extent of his vote controlling the legislation of Congress? Has he not been recognized without a murmur and without a word of objection? So far as that fact is concerned, I hold that the Senate is barred by its own action, that it should have excluded the honorable gentleman who represents Virginia on the floor already if Virginia be not entitled as a State to representation on this floor. I put it to Senators to say, if Mr. Bowden had been living to-day, whether he would not have been allowed to occupy his seat without let or hindrance, without any objection, the same as his honorable colleague has been allowed to occupy his seat without objection. I say, therefore, the action of the Senate itself has recognized the fact not only that Virginia is entitled to representation on this floor, but that she has been and is represented on this floor; and so long as the honorable Senator who represents Virginia here is allowed to retain his seat, it strikes me that it is not competent for the Senate to say that Virginia is not entitled to representation on this floor.

I fully concur in all that has been said in regard to the importance of this question. I know very well, for I have been enabled to see it and to feel it personally, with what eager desire the loyal population of Virginia are looking to the action of Congress in this respect to sustain the Legislature at Alexandria. I know how all the north-west portion of Virginia, now composing the State of West Virginia, was brought in around the loyal Legislature of Wheeling, forming a nucleus, until the whole State was brought under the flag of the Union and under the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitution; and I know that such will be the result in Virginia if its loyal Legislature is sustained. County after county—such is my information from beyond the lines to-day, having letters in abundance to that effect—eagerly desire for the time to come when they shall be relieved of the power of the rebellion, that they may reorganize the old government of Virginia around the Legislature at Alexandria.

But, sir, it is a fact, not only that the Senate of the United States has recognized the existence of Virginia as a State, and her right to be represented on this floor, but the executive branch of the Government has done so, I imagine; for I saw it stated in the papers the other day that the Secretary of State had transmitted the constitutional amendment for the abolition of slavery to the Executive of Virginia, and through him it was sent to the Legislature to be acted upon, and that Legislature had acted upon it and ratified the amendment. We shall place ourselves in a singular position if we reject a gentleman who comes here accredited with a certificate of election in due form, and repulse him from our doors and refuse to allow him a seat on the floor, when we have another member representing the same State upon the floor, and when the executive branch of the Government recognizes the Virginia Legislature at Alexandria as the true Legislature, and Governor Pierpoint as the true and legitimate Governor of Virginia. I trust that this matter will not be referred at all, but that we will hold out the inducement to the loyal people of Virginia to rally around the loyal Legislature at Alexandria.

The Senator from Michigan said awhile ago that we had shed too much blood to bring Virginia back into the Union and be humbugged by proceedings like this. Why, sir, the very object is to bring Virginia back into the Union; and it strikes me there is no more available and desirable means by which to bring her back under the old flag, and to restore her to her allegiance and place in the Federal Government than the very organization of the loyal people around the loyal Legislature, under a loyal government and a loyal Governor, as fast as the power of the United States can relieve the loyal people of Virginia from the pressure of the rebellion. As to the disloyal, certainly it is not the object of Senators on the other side to say that they should have a voice in restoring the government of Virginia.

I hope, sir, that it will be the pleasure of the Senate to allow Mr. Segar to be at once qualified, for all the investigations which can be made before the Committee on the Judiciary will not place this body in possession of any facts that are not now, as I suppose, well known to the body.

I desire to say, before I sit down, that the honorable Senator from Michigan was mistaken in supposing that the whole of the State of Virginia is declared to be in rebellion. The proclamation of the President exempted by name the counties represented at Alexandria. Some of those counties never were declared to be in a state of insurrection, and others, since the issuing of the proclamation, by the interposition of the Federal Executive, have been relieved from the operation and effect of that proclamation; and those counties now represented at Alexandria are not under the operation of the proclamation of the President declaring Virginia to be in insurrection.

While, of course, I do not desire to interpose any objection to what might be for the interests and the welfare of the country, and what might be really the desire of honorable Senators, yet I would fain hope that the Senator would now allow Mr. Segar to take his seat. The credentials on their face are fair; there is no objection to them; and I suggest whether, if these other facts to which Senators allude should exist, or should be supposed to exist, they could be examined afterward by a reference to a committee. It may be a grave question whether a State in the condition in which Virginia is now placed shall be allowed to have representation on this floor; but, sir, it is a very grave question when a gentleman comes from a State of this Union with credentials in due form under the seal of the Commonwealth, to stop him at the threshold and say that he shall not take his place upon this floor. I say that it is a very grave question, and one which it seems to me should not be acted upon adversely without the plainest facts to justify it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Chair whether this subject overrides the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands it so, or the Chair would have called up the unfinished business at one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to submit to the Senate one or two considerations on this subject, and I shall close my remarks by submitting a motion that is not debatable.

The credentials presented to us purport to show that this gentleman was elected a member of this body on the 8th day of December last, and they bear date on the 12th day of December last. They have been held by him for more than sixty days. Every intelligent man must have known that the presentation of these credentials would give rise to debate, would involve grave political questions about which there are radical differences of opinion in this body and throughout the country. The condition of the State of Virginia, the condition of the rebel States, the effect of the rebellion, all these matters are involved in the question now presented to the Senate. This gentleman, holding these papers, might at any moment have presented them as a privileged question, and have stopped all the business of this body until they were disposed of, either referred or acted upon. Now, I ask the Senator whether it is reasonable for us at this period of the session to stop our deliberations when all the important bills of the session remain unacted upon for the purpose of considering this question. When this gentleman has had these papers in his possession for more than sixty days, when he had the right at any day to present them and call on us to decide the question raised by them, is it reasonable, I ask, to present them at this period of the session, and ask us to postpone all the important business of the session for the purpose of considering them? It seems to me it is not; and, therefore, without going into the merits of the proposition, which is a very grave and difficult one, upon which I myself have not made up my opinion, although I have read and thought a great deal about it, I submit whether, under the circumstances, the best disposition is not to leave the question to be settled by the next Congress.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 54.

The State of Virginia is now represented by one Senator in this body. The State of West Virginia is ably represented by two Senators. The Senator-elect, or the person who claims to act as the Senator-elect from Virginia, has slept upon his rights for sixty, ay, seventy days. It seems to me, therefore, that for the short period of the term for which he was elected, only fifteen days, it is scarcely worth while for us to delay the ordinary business of the country and stop and deliberate upon his right to a seat which at any rate will expire on the 4th day of March next. The question when presented to the next Congress will be one that we shall have ample time to decide. It will be presented at the threshold on the 4th of March next. No doubt then a gentleman claiming to be a Senator from the State of Virginia will present his credentials. Then we can take up the matter and determine it. We can take time, we can deliberate, we can get full information on the subject; and we can dispose of these grave political questions without interfering with the public business. Now we cannot. Under the circumstances, therefore, I feel it my duty to submit a motion that the credentials do lie upon the table.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will ask the Senator from Ohio to withdraw the motion for a moment and I will renew it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot do it.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will make the same motion after having submitted a remark or two.

Mr. SHERMAN. I could not withdraw it without giving rise to further debate.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable. The motion is not withdrawn.

Mr. McDUGALL. Then I wish to say a word on a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. McDUGALL. This is a question of privilege. It is the right of the person who comes here to take his place on the floor, claiming the same right as any other Senator from any other State to have the question considered. The question presented is one of privilege, as the Chair has ruled; and what does "privilege" mean? It means that it is the right of the question to be heard, and it is not subject to the rules by which any other question can be laid on the table and action upon it denied. That is involved in the very proposition by its very first terms. The presentation of credentials, and the action of the Senate upon them does not belong to the ordinary course of business, and is not governed by the common rules of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator that when a point of order is made it must be decided, like the other question, without debate.

Mr. McDUGALL. I raise the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the point of order.

Mr. McDUGALL. The point of order is this: that the motion to lay this question on the table is not in order when any Senator desires to debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no hesitation upon the point. The question is a privileged question, to come up upon motion before the Senate; but when it is before the Senate it is, like any other subject, to be disposed of by the action of the Senate.

Mr. McDUGALL. But debate cannot be barred by a motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no question on the point. Debate is not in order.

Mr. McDUGALL. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the decision of the Chair an appeal is taken; and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio, whether his motion be to lay the credentials upon the table, or the proposition to refer the credentials to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, a motion to lay the motion to refer on the table would carry the credentials with it, so that no question of that kind arises. The question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the sense of the Senate?

The question being put, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion to lay the credentials upon the table.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. McDUGALL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 29, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Farwell, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—29.
NAYS—Messrs. Dixon, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Riddle, and Stewart—8.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of R. B. Forbes, of Boston, Massachusetts, who represents that he is the agent and part owner of the steamship Meteor, which was built and fitted specially to cruise for confederate vessels; that she has been tested by supervising officers detailed by the Navy Department, who pronounced her to be very fast; that he has offered her for other tests—a run between Boston and Port Royal and back; that after the reduction of Fort Fisher the Secretary of the Navy does not feel justified in buying her; and he prays that Congress may make an appropriation to buy her. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel L. Gerould, praying for certain allowances due to him while acting as clerk and reporter to a court-martial, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 450) for the relief of Samuel L. Robinson, when in pursuit of deserters, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 454) granting a pension to Thomas Booth, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Josephine Rice, widow of Brigadier General James C. Rice, praying for a pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of W. H. and C. S. Duncan, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of Charles Taylor, of Victoria county, Texas, praying for compensation for services rendered and supplies advanced to the United States at Chicago, in the State of Illinois, during the Black Hawk war, in 1832, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

ASSISTANT COLLECTOR OF JERSEY CITY.

Mr. TEN EYCK. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of citizens of the counties of Hudson and Bergen, New Jersey, the memorial of several members of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, the memorial of the mayor and common council of Jersey City, New Jersey, the memorial of the common council of Bergen, New Jersey, the memorial of the mayor and common council of the city of Hoboken, New Jersey, the memorial of the mayor and common council of Hudson City, New Jersey, and the memorial of owners and masters of coasting vessels owned in whole or in part by residents of the counties of Hudson and Bergen, New Jersey, praying that the "Act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York, and to appoint an assistant collector to reside at Jersey City," approved February 21, 1863, may be so amended that the said assistant collector shall have the charge of loading and unloading vessels to and from foreign ports, the warehousing of merchandise, and be empowered to enroll and license coasting vessels owned in whole or in part in the counties of Bergen and Hudson, have had all these petitions under consideration, and have instructed me to report the same back, accompanied by a bill; and as it is a very small matter, I ask that the bill be put on its passage now.

The bill (S. No. 454) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York, and to appoint an assistant collector to reside at Jersey city," approved February 21, 1863, was read a first time by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to put the bill just reported on its passage. Is there any objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that it appoints a new officer, and I, therefore, object.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It does not do so. It simply authorizes an officer to grant licenses for vessels in that district.

Mr. SHERMAN. It makes no new officer?

Mr. TEN EYCK. None at all, and no new expense.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I shall interpose no objection.

There being no objection, the bill was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the assistant collector appointed under the act of February 21, 1863, to enroll and license, according to the laws of the United States, all vessels engaged in the coasting trade and fisheries owned in whole or in part by residents of the counties of Hudson and Bergen, in the State of New Jersey, and all such enrollments and licenses are to be as valid and effectual as if the same had been effected in any other port of the United States; and the assistant collector, in the enrollment and licensing of vessels, is to be subject to the laws of the United States, and liable to all the penalties and responsibilities imposed upon collectors in like cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now call for the unfinished business.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let us get through with the morning business first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall be allowed to get through with the reports of committees and the introduction of bills.

Mr. SUMNER. I trust the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his motion for a few moments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to withdrawing it for the introduction of bills, but I do not wish any motion to postpone prior orders and take up another bill to be interposed. I will yield for the ordinary morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is now in order.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 452) to incorporate "the Capitol Hotel Company" in Washington city, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 453) to provide for the construction of certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 113) authorizing certain banks in the District of Columbia to accept the provisions of an act therein named; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 114) authorizing additional copies of public documents to be printed for the Department of State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPUDIATION OF REBEL DEBT.

Mr. SUMNER. I submit the following concurrent resolution. I should like to have it acted upon at once if the Senate is ready to vote upon it; if not let it lie on the table for the present:

Whereas certain persons have put in circulation the report that on the suppression of the rebellion the rebel debt or loan may be recognized in whole or in part by the United States; and whereas such a report is calculated to give a false value to such rebel debt or loan: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring), That Congress hereby declares that the rebel debt or loan is simply an agency of the rebellion which the United States can never, under any circumstances, recognize in any part or in any way.

I should like to have the action of the Senate now upon the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY and Mr. McDOUGALL objected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I heard two or three objections to the resolution, and I know it will give rise to debate.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not think there will be any debate upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I heard several objections, and I am satisfied it will give rise to debate.

Mr. SUMNER. If there is any objection, the resolution cannot be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the present consideration of the resolution objected to?

Mr. SAULSBURY and Mr. McDOUGALL. It is objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution cannot be considered to-day.

STATEMENT OF EXPORTS AND IMPORTS.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be prepared for the use of the Senate a statement of the actual values of merchandise imported into the United States and exported to foreign countries for each year from 1857 to 1864, inclusive, with an analysis of the conditions affecting the external commerce of the country as regards the completeness of the returns, and the difference in the valuations of imports and exports as reported; with an approximate correction of these differences to a common standard, and an exhibit of the balances resulting in each year; also the movement of leading export staples and of the precious metals during the same period, with the course of foreign exchange.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WADE to add the following as additional sections to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist of the vice-admiral, one rear admiral, one commodore, one captain, one commander, and one lieutenant commander, over which the Secretary of the Navy or the officer of highest rank present shall preside; and when the subject under consideration shall appertain to the duties of any bureau in the Navy Department the chief of such bureau shall be a member of the board, and entitled to sit and vote on the subject.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the board shall deliberate in common and advise the Secretary on any matters relating to naval organization, naval legislation, the construction, equipment, and armament of vessels, navy-yards, and other naval establishments, and the direction, employment, and disposition of the naval forces in time of war when required by him. All such opinions shall be recorded.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That no vessel-of-war shall be built or materially altered, nor any guns of new construction ordered or adopted, nor any engine for any vessel-of-war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon, and all courts-martial ordered by the Secretary of the Navy shall be detailed by the board.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That all invitations for plans or proposals for any of the works above mentioned shall be prepared by the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary; and all bids or offers or proposals for the same shall be opened in the presence of the board, and the award made by it, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary may add to the board, from time to time, other officers of the Navy eligible to the position of chief of bureau, not exceeding three, at any time for consultation on any of the above subjects. The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects, in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator from New Hampshire proceeds I wish to move that at half past four o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock. I have consulted with Senators, and I think that will be the better plan.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is some weeks since in the morning hour, on a resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] I endeavored to submit some views of mine in regard to questions of interest in the administration of the Navy Department, and it will be within the recollection of the Chair, and of everybody else that taxes his memory with such trifling history, that I made three successive attempts to finish my remarks, and by the expiration of the hour that was allotted to the consideration of such matters I was cut off each time, and failed in my endeavor to get the Senate to make it a special order, and I shall now improve the opportunity which is presented by the consideration of this bill making appropriations for the naval service, to close as well as I may what I intended then to have said.

But before I proceed to make square work of it I will endeavor to answer a question which was propounded to me by the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who asked me if I had any knowledge who it was that had instructed a committee or commission that was sent out by the Navy Department to Boston and Portsmouth to make inquiries into my conduct, who it was that had constituted a committee of pimps and spies, sent out by the Navy Department, into a board of censorship over the members of the Senate to try them for the duties they had performed here. I was careful not to say anything on that point at that time. Though I had undoubted convictions in my own mind, I preferred not to express them here. I will state now that I do not know of my own knowledge who was the author of the instructions that were sent; but upon evidence on which I rely, evidence which satisfies my mind beyond any mistake, and as well as I am satisfied of the vast majority of facts that I know upon the testimony of others, I do know that it was the Assistant Secretary of the Navy who sent a board of pimps and spies to Boston and Portsmouth, instructing them to inquire especially into any connection that I might have had with any contracts for the Navy Department; and they had written instructions.

I would ask the honorable Senator from Maryland, who hears me, if a committee were sent out by the Senate and went to procure certain evidence, and they were found having written instructions in their hands as to how they were to proceed, whether he would have any great doubt in his own mind about where the instructions came from. I take it the fact of itself that the committee were thus sent would be conclusive evidence.

Mr. GRIMES. It is due to the Assistant Secretary of the Navy to say that he utterly denies in the most positive terms—and his communication to the Senate on that subject will be laid on the table of the Senate very shortly—that he gave any such instructions, or that such instructions were given to anybody. I will state further, that I have seen the letter of instruction, of which these remarks in relation to the Senator according to the speech that he made here some days ago purported to be a part, and that it is an entire interlineation, and is not in the copy in the Navy Department.

Mr. HALE. I have not a doubt on that subject that the Assistant Secretary of the Navy would deny it any more than I have that he gave the instructions. In regard to the matter being an interlineation, it happens, unfortunately for that version of the story, that the paper of which

I spoke and which was furnished to me at Portsmouth, where it was dropped by one of the committee, contained all the instructions, and there is no interlineation. The statement referred to is not a part of anything else; it is the whole paper; there is nothing else of it, nothing interlined, nothing erased. I do not want to make any controversy on that subject; but whenever the report of which the Senator speaks does come to the Senate I can prove, if human testimony can prove anything, and I can prove it by a man who had the confidence of the Navy Department at that time, that if Mr. Fox was not the author of that identical paper he did give just exactly such instructions to another individual, and put him upon that track, and made use of this classical phrase, that he was going to "camp on HALE's track."

I have thus endeavored to answer the question of the Senator from Maryland; and whenever the fact can be brought to an issue, not before a naval court-martial, composed of retired naval officers whose favor depends upon rendering a verdict such as is required of them; but whenever the matter is submitted to any impartial tribunal that understands the force of evidence, I can prove the truth of what I have stated beyond controversy and beyond mistake, because that evidence has been submitted to me and I have not the shadow of a doubt upon it.

In that connection I want to say to the Senator from Kentucky, who introduced the resolution for appointing a committee on corruptions, that I think it is due to the Senate, before they institute any more committees of inquiry, that they protect the witnesses who are called before them, and do not suffer them to be seized and incarcerated the moment they have left the jurisdiction of the Senate, where they have been testifying in obedience to a call and summons of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. HALE. I think it ought to be done, too. I now proceed to conclude the remarks on the head upon which I was speaking when I was interrupted by the expiration of the hour in which I was speaking.

I was speaking in reference to the frauds which the committee of investigation, of which I was a member, had disclosed, and about which no action has yet been taken. After examining a good deal of testimony, and finding the most astounding fact that where there was a single bidder his bid was raised one hundred, two hundred, and sometimes three hundred per cent., we were at a loss to know by what particular agency the knowledge came to the bidders which enabled them so to bid. We were at a loss to know how it was that no single individual putting in bids varying nearly one hundred per cent. from his original bids, should yet be able to get them in at one or two, or not exceeding five cents below the next highest bidder, so as in every case to secure the bid to himself. After considerable investigation, having been baffled a great many times, we at last found a witness who gave us what to my mind was a sufficient clue, and I will read it to the Senate. This man had stood pretty high in the estimation of portions of the Navy Department. I read from the report:

"Near the close of the examination some direct evidence was obtained from Mr. Ira Murdock, formerly chief clerk of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, which, if it may be relied upon, certainly goes far toward explaining at least one of the modes by which such knowledge may have been obtained. He testifies that at the opening of the bids in the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the spring of 1863, on the day for opening them, they were opened and entered on the schedule in presence of various parties who were present and freely examined them all. Mr. H. D. Stover?"

He it was who got the contract at every yard on that occasion—

"was not present at this opening, but a Mr. Ainsworth Brown, his agent, who acted for him, was. No bids from Stover were presented or opened on that day, but the next morning this same Mr. Brown, who was present at the opening of the day previous, and of course knew what each and all of the bids were, appeared at the office of the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering with a number of bids in the name of Mr. Stover, which were accepted, and were successful."

That was a pretty satisfactory explanation. Stover's agent stood by on the day appointed by law for the opening of the bids, heard them all, took memoranda of them, noted the prices, and the next day came in with bids from two to five cents below every bidder, and took every contract himself. When that fact came out it immediately found its way from this Capitol to the other end of the avenue, and certain official characters connected with the Navy Department were busy in connection with the witness. They manipulated him, and came in themselves and attempted to make a sort of explanation which anybody may find who wants to read it in the report.

My attention was called to this matter somewhat by seeing how these gentlemen were operating. I found out, and found out by accident, that the most enormous frauds were being perpetrated right under my own nose in the navy-yard within ten miles of where I live. I found there that monkey-wrenches, the fair price of which was from twelve to fifteen dollars a dozen, were bought by the Navy Department at Portsmouth for $150 a dozen. There were a great many other items in the contracts made at the same time quite as extravagant as that. For example, two thousand pounds of cotton-waste, the fair market value of which was from thirty to forty cents a pound, was obtained by the Department under contract at eighty cents a pound; and when the contractors had given all they could at this enormous price under the contract, then as a matter of favor the Government was asked to buy the rest, I believe, at about thirty cents. All the articles in the same bid to which I am now referring averaged one hundred and fifty per cent. above the fair market price of the articles. Take the item of anvils, weighing about two hundred pounds, the fair market value of which was thirty dollars; the Government paid fifty dollars. Axes, handled, worth $1 25 each, were obtained at three dollars. Small axes, the fair price of which was seventy-five cents, were furnished to the Government for $1 50. Grindstones worth $4 50 each, were sold to the Government for thirty dollars each. Scale-beams worth $6 50, were sold for fifty dollars; and so on the prices ranged throughout. Attention being called to this, we had a committee of investigation, and that committee found, as every man who will take the trouble to read the report must see, that rottenness was the rule and corruption was the practice, and the Government was being swindled beyond all credulity. We have so reported, and no action has been taken on that report, and yet the Senator from Kentucky wants to have a standing committee raised to find out frauds generally in the Government.

I have mentioned these facts as facts of history. I do not blame the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for sending his commissioners to Charlestown and Portsmouth to see if he could not find out something that HALE had done. The law of self-preservation, not to say of revenge, was sufficient to instigate him on such an errand. These facts, sir, cover over the history of the transactions of the Navy Department, and they are doing the same thing to-day, only in another form. I do not want to tell you what they all are; but I will tell you one of the means by which these frauds are being perpetrated now. The Department advertises for certain specific articles, describing them precisely. Let me suppose for a moment that the article wanted is brick. The advertisement describes the thickness and the length exactly. A man who is not inside the ring, who is not sure that he has got a friend in the Department, is afraid to put in anything but the precise article exactly according to the measure and width specified. Other men who understand that they have friends at court will put in a bid below the real price of the article, and when the bid is put in and accepted they will have instructions sent from some of the bureaus of the Navy Department to the officers of the different yards to accept an inferior article; and it is being done to-day; and that answers a double purpose; for if the contractor turns out to be obnoxious to any one of these men the fact that he has furnished an inferior article will be a matter for which he can be brought before a naval commission or court-martial and sent to the State prison.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to another matter to show how this Department in some of its bureaus is administered, and I will go into this at some length, because it is of consequence. There have been some remarkable facts in the history of the Navy Department in the Bureau of Yards and Docks. I do not speak now of the fact which the report of the committee disclosed, and which is apparent, that the head of the Bureau of Docks and Yards is in the habit of paying very large prices by contracts ordered by himself to his particular friends. I do not refer to that now; but I refer merely to the enlargement of navy-yards. The Secretary of the Navy in various reports called attention to the fact that the area of our navy-yards was not large enough for the amount of business consequent on the increase caused by the war. Accordingly, as early as July 14, 1862, Congress made an appropriation of $14,500 for the purchase of twenty-seven and three hundred and fifty-five thousandths acres of land adjacent to the Kittery navy-yard, in plain, unambiguous language, without dispute, without cavil in its terms; and they added a further provision that the head of the bureau should be authorized to buy another piece of land if he saw fit. That law was not executed, and has not been to this day, and I want to show you a little of the history of it. The provision, I have said, was made by a law of the 14th of July, 1862. On the 1st of October, 1862, the head of the Bureau of Yards and Docks wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Navy giving the reasons why the law was not executed; and what do you suppose they were? I will read:

"It has been suggested that the appropriation for the twenty-seven and three hundred and fifty-five thousandths acres adjacent to the navy-yard was intended by Congress to embrace the land of Mrs. Paymaster Bridge, but it is not so expressed. The boundary lines of the land of Mrs. Bridge, as will be seen by reference to the map, form a very irregular plot of ground, running away from, and not adjacent to, the navy-yard."

It so happens that this land lies exactly opposite to the yard. It was as near to the navy-yard as any land on the face of the earth could be, for there was nothing but the river between it and the land. Of course if you began near the river and ran from it, the boundary would go away from the navy-yard; but if you began at the other end and went to the river it would run toward it. That is one of the sage reasons why the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks did not execute the law, because the land was running away from the yard instead of being adjacent to it! Finding out, as I thought, that it was the intention of the head of that bureau, who had it under his control, not to execute the law, I introduced a resolution into the Senate at the commencement of the session of December, 1862, which was passed, calling on the Secretary to know if that law had been executed, or if any attempts had been made to negotiate for the purchase, and what obstacles, if any, had prevented the intention of Congress from being carried into effect. That resolution was passed on the 3d of December, 1862, and on the 6th of December of the same year the Secretary of the Navy answered that call of the Senate by telling them that the information called for by the resolution would be found in the report of the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, which was communicated to both Houses of Congress on the 1st instant, with the report of the Secretary of the Navy accompanying the President's message. By looking at that report you will find that the chief of the bureau says this:

"In regard to the purchase of twenty-seven and three hundred and fifty-five thousandths acres of ground on Seavey's island, adjacent to the Portsmouth navy-yard, for which purchase $14,500 was appropriated by act of July 14, 1862, I have to remark that no great progress has been made. Upon examination of the premises, I found that a public road had been established from the bridge, connecting Seavey's island with the navy-yard, across the whole island."

He found that out "upon examination;" the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks then for the first time ascertained that there was a road! He knew it just exactly as well as he knew that there was a yard there.

"It has been suggested that the appropriation was intended to purchase the land and appurtenances owned by certain parties, but the law is not so expressed."

It is true it was not so expressed, but the matter was before a committee of conference, and the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks was there, and the area of the land to be purchased was all marked out in red lines, making exactly twenty-seven and three hundred and fifty-five thousandths acres, and it was known just as well as any fact could be known, and yet the chief of the bureau, as an excuse for not executing the law, says he did not know what land was meant.

"The boundary line of the premises suggested as intended to be purchased with the appropriation is very irregular, and does not embrace such a plot of ground as would afford the best accommodations for naval and hospital purposes.

"The road above referred to runs through these premises, and it would not be wise, in my opinion, to expend the money appropriated for the purchase of twenty-seven and three hundred and fifty-five thousandths acres of ground on this island while this public easement remains and is occupied as such; besides, the title required by law to be obtained cannot be acquired until the assent of the State, by grant of jurisdiction, shall be secured?"

It is sufficient to say in answer to that that there is no such law on the statute-book, and never was. There is a law which required the assent of Maine to the purchase, but a law requiring the assent of Maine to the jurisdiction is not on the statute-book, was not at the time this was assigned as a reason, and never was.

"and the Legislature of the State of Maine does not assemble, I am informed, until next January, so that the money could not be paid in any event till after Congress assembles, and therefore I advise that the subject be submitted to it for further action."

Another session of Congress came round. This law remained on the statute-books a dead letter through the obstinacy of the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. In the mean time the State of Maine, on the 10th of January, 1863, had passed this law:

"An Act ceding Jurisdiction over certain lands on Seavey's island, in the town of Kittery, United States.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in Legislature assembled, as follows: SEC. 1. Jurisdiction is hereby granted and ceded to the United States of America over such portion of Seavey's island, in the town of Kittery, as may be purchased for the purpose of using the same as a part of the navy-yard located in that town, and consent is hereby given to the purchase of the same by the United States: Provided always, That this State shall retain and does retain concurrent jurisdiction with the United States in and over all lands hereby ceded, so far as that all civil and all criminal processes issuing under the authority of this State may be executed on said lands and in any buildings thereon, or to be erected thereon, in the same way and manner as if jurisdiction had not been granted as aforesaid: And provided, That the exclusive jurisdiction shall revert to and vest in the State of Maine whenever the said land so ceded shall cease to be used by the United States for the purpose hereinbefore declared.

"SEC. 2. This act shall take effect from and after the purchase of any portion of said Seavey's island by the United States, the evidence of such purchase being duly recorded in the registry of deeds for the county of York."

By this action the jurisdiction of Maine having been ceded over the whole island or any part of it that the United States might need for the purposes of a navy-yard, I supposed that every obstacle was removed to the carrying out of the intention of Congress, and I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Navy asking him then if he intended to carry out that law. On the 1st of May, 1863, after Maine had ceded her whole jurisdiction to all the island or any part of it, I addressed this letter to the Secretary of the Navy:

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1863.

SIR: I beg leave respectfully to inquire whether the provision of law passed on the 14th of July, A. D., 1862, appropriating $14,500 for the purchase of twenty-seven and three hundred and fifty-five thousandths acres of land on Seavey's Island, adjacent to the Kittery navy-yard, has been executed; and if it has not, whether it is the intention of the Secretary to execute the same prior to the next session of Congress. I will be obliged by as early an answer as convenient, addressed to me at Dover, New Hampshire.

With much respect, yours, JOHN P. HALE.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy.

On the 19th of May, nearly three weeks afterwards, the Secretary answered as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 19, 1863.

SIR: Your communication of the 1st instant was received, inquiring whether that provision of law passed on the 14th of July, 1862, appropriating $14,500 for the purchase of twenty-seven and three hundred and fifty-five thousandths acres of land on Seavey's island, adjacent to the Kittery navy-yard, has been executed; and if it has not, whether it is the intention of the Secretary to execute the same prior to the next session of Congress. On referring this question to the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, to whom the subject appropriately and immediately pertains, I learn that he deems it inexpedient to move in the matter until there is further and specific legislation. I may say in this connection, that though not personally familiar with the locality, it seems to me, if any thing is done in the premises, it is desirable that the whole island should, if possible, be obtained for the Government.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GIDEON WELLES,

Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. JOHN P. HALE,
United States Senator, Dover, New Hampshire.

On the 31st of January, 1863, the chief of the bureau addressed this question to the Secretary of the Navy:

"I beg leave respectfully to suggest that Congress be requested to state what land, and whose, the law of the last session was intended to purchase on Seavey's island, adjacent to the navy-yard, Kittery, or to repeal that portion of the law appropriating $14,500 for the purchase of said land."

In a communication which he made on the 5th of January, 1863, in answer to a letter which I had addressed to the Secretary, and which the Secretary referred to him, asking wherein he did not think it expedient to move in the matter, he gives a reason. He says Congress were governed by personal motives in ordering the purchase. I read from the letter of the chief of the bureau:

"The Senator avers that the Department, committees, and Congress knew precisely what land, and whose it was, that the law appropriated money to purchase; if so, and Congress thought proper to make a purchase, unsolicited by the Department, of property, with personal instead of public consideration, the object could only be obtained by making the phraseology of the law so explicit as to relieve the Department from any responsibility or judgment in the premises."

Is it not well that we have such an old Roman as that at the head of one of our bureaus? He stands between Congress and public plunder, and says that if Congress act from such personal motives as these they must be a little more explicit before they can get him to interfere to carry out any of their plans! And, sir, he was not the only officer in the Navy Department who was guilty of this gross insult to Congress. The chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery found the same fault with Congress in undertaking to make a purchase which he had not asked for. I read from his communication of January 9, 1863:

"It will be observed, too, the law locates the hospital on Seavey's island; so that if there had been any causes for postponing the purchase of the land, in the way of securing title or concurrent jurisdiction, they were also calculated to retard the work upon the hospital. Though the hospital and purchase of land are forced into connection, they are not necessarily involved; as it has always been thought the site of the present decayed and antiquated house would prove a good location for the new building. As no evil consequences have resulted from the hospital for perhaps half a century no danger could possibly be apprehended from a new and better building. It was not necessary, therefore, to purchase any additional land for the hospital, nor was the purchase recommended by the Navy Department.

"It will be noticed the bill locates the hospital legislatively, without reference to the question whether the island be the most or least judicious situation for it, and postpones all work upon the needed improvement until the irrelevant subject of purchase of the island be adjusted. It will thus be seen that all the delay in regard to the erection of a hospital has arisen from the unfortunate commingling of public with private interests, and it will doubtless continue till these interests are separated."

That is signed, "W. Whelan, chief of Bureau of Medicine and Surgery." The chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks wrote another letter to the Department on the 27th of April, 1864, assigning another reason why he had not executed this law, and I think that if there is any pettifogger in this land who wants to raise a sharp point he may take a lesson here:

"The objections stated heretofore by the bureau to the purchase of Mr. Bridge's land, if that, as is supposed, is the ground intended, still exists, namely: its very irregular shape; the county road passing through it, and the want of jurisdiction from the State over that road. The act of jurisdiction specified cedes 'such portion of Seavey's island, in the town of Kittery, as may be purchased for the purpose of using the same as a part of the navy-yard located in that town.' It does not embrace the road, inasmuch as the land offered to Congress as the twenty-seven and five hundred and fifty-five thousandths acres lie on either side of the said road, and does not include it."

The State of Maine did not know how to give away jurisdiction over that road. She had ceded the whole island, every inch of it, or if you would not take the whole, over all that the Government might want; and yet the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, to carry out his obstinate determination not to execute this law, says Maine did not cede the road. He might as well have said that Maine did not cede the grass growing on it, or the stones which might be found there, and out of which a stone wall might have been made.

In that way the will of Congress in regard to the enlargement of the navy-yard at Portsmouth has been defeated, set at naught, denied willfully and perseveringly. But how is it at Charlestown? At Charlestown they want to buy all the land they can get at any price that anybody will ask for it. While they refused to buy this land at Portsmouth so absolutely necessary, a purchase recommended by the commandant of the yard, and by a board sent there for the purpose of making examinations, and they could get it at $500 an acre, they must buy land adjoining the Charlestown navy-yard at something like fifty thousand dollars an acre, and after they had got that and still refused to carry out the law for the enlargement of the Portsmouth navy-yard they came next year to Congress and asked permission to purchase another piece of land at Charlestown which a couple of speculators had bought for the express purpose of selling to the Government. By some means, I do not know what—they were undoubtedly honest means—they induced the House of Representatives to insert authority for that in the naval appropriation bill. It came to the Senate, and was so fully exposed here that the Senate by a very decided vote refused to give their sanction to it, and this year we have not been troubled with any more speculations about land adjoining the Charlestown navy-yard; but still this law in regard to the enlargement of the Portsmouth navy-yard remains unexecuted, and the want of a hospital which was to be built there still remains.

This matter was brought up at the last session of Congress, and a law was then passed appropriating $25,000 for building a hospital, leaving the Department to settle its location. On the 18th of March, 1864, Mr. Whelan, who had decided that the old yard was a good enough place for the hospital, and suggested that Congress were corrupt in trying to get it located anywhere else, addressed this letter to the Secretary of the Navy:

"Sir: An act of Congress (No. 24) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, appropriates $25,000 for erecting a naval hospital at Kittery, Maine, and according to the debate in the Senate, as reported in the Daily Globe of the 13th ultimo, it was the understanding that the site was to be selected within or without the limits of the navy-yard, as might be found most judicious and expedient.

"As considerable feeling has been manifested on the subject, as the selection of a site may or may not involve additional outlays of money, I have the honor to suggest that this subject may be confided to—"

Whom? To himself, who had already decided, and said Congress were corrupt in doing anything else than what he thought proper—

"to a board, consisting of Commodore John Pope, United States Navy, Surgeon Charles Chase, United States Navy, the surgeon of the navy-yard, Portsmouth, the chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, subject, of course, to the final approval of the honorable Secretary of the Navy; the board to meet at the navy-yard, Portsmouth, on Friday, the 25th instant."

There was W. Whelan, who had already decided that the old site was the best one for it, selecting himself and three of his subordinates, together with Captain Pope, to settle the question which he had already decided; and what did the Secretary do? The Secretary simply indorsed, "Recommendation approved." Mr. Whelan says, "I appoint myself to adjudicate a question upon which there has been great interest, a question that I have already decided, and I associate with me three subordinates under me, together with Captain Pope, to go down and settle this question." They went down and reported just exactly what you might have supposed they would report; just exactly what Whelan had decided before. This was such an outrage and was so felt by everybody who knew anything about it, that the Senators from New Hampshire and Maine, and the Representatives from those States, united in a representation to the Secretary of the Navy about the last of March, showing the reasons why the hospital should not be built where Mr. Whelan wanted to put it, and concluded with this remark:

"We should much prefer seeing the law making the appropriation for the hospital repealed to having it thus expended. Besides, we cannot conceive what can induce the Government to place this hospital on this particular yard, when it has not been done in any other navy-yard, so far as we are advised, in the United States."

This was signed by all the Senators and Representatives from Maine and New Hampshire except Mr. SWEAT, who was not then here. To that long argument which we presented expressing the wish that the appropriation should be repealed rather than that the hospital should be built there, what answer did we get. I will tell you. This is from the chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery:

"As the site for a hospital at the navy-yard, Portsmouth, New Hampshire, as it is usually called, had been made the subject of protracted discussion, owing to considerations not entirely pertinent to the real issue, the Department confided the duty of selection to a board of four officers, three of whom enjoyed the great advantage by long service on the station, of entire familiarity with the topography, or any natural or artificial features of the ground."

He goes on and states what they did, and says:

"But curious to remark, the objections did not emanate from any one of the many medical officers or commandants who have served on the station, or whose particular experience was so valuable, but from gentlemen of other pursuits, or of civil life; and among them those whose judgment was not wholly devoid of that bias which private interests are apt, even unconsciously, to create."

Here, then, the delegations of Maine and New Hampshire in the House of Representatives and in the Senate are again insulted by the head of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, by being told that they are not devoid of the bias which private interest creates. This is three times that this insinuation is thus broadly cast in the face of Congress for the honest exercise of their duty. He says that the proposition to buy this piece of land was not recommended by the commandant of the yard. The fact is that it was recommended by Captain Pearson who had been for a long time at the yard, and it was recommended by a board of officers that were sent there to examine it, and who gave especial reasons why it was the best place, and presented an array of facts why the hospital should not be put in the midst of the navy-yard containing altogether only about sixty acres. This was presented so forcibly that even the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, who had determined from the outset not to execute the law, was compelled to say, "the objections raised to the construction of a hospital in the navy-yard are in some respects well taken;" and then he wound up with this very satisfactory remark:

"In this matter I have been guided by what I have considered a conscientious sense of duty, and shall be happy to receive such instructions as will enable me to further the public interests, and conform to the law in letter and spirit."

It happened, fortunately for the argument of those who were opposed to locating the hospital on Seavey's island, but unfortunately for those who contended for its being placed in the navy-yard, that the very evil which the Senators and Representatives from Maine and New Hampshire suggested actually happened. A vessel came in there during the next summer with a contagious disease on board; the master mechanic of the department of lumber, I believe, died of the disease, and such consternation was produced there in the yard that work was nearly or almost entirely suspended for a long time, simply because, owing to the perversity and obstinacy of the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, to whom the Secretary had committed this matter, he would not execute this plain law.

Mr. President, we yesterday agreed to an appropriation of I do not know how much money for enlarging a lot near the Washington navy-yard, and for various other purposes in connection with other navy-yards. I suppose that when Congress pass such appropriations it is supposed they will be carried into execution; but if the chief of some bureau thinks it unwise, or takes it into his head that Congress have been governed by private and personal motives in making the appropriations, here you have an example before you in which the authority of law and the authority of Congress has been denied and defied. Whenever I have undertaken, in the discharge of the duties which devolve upon me, to have this law carried out—a law not originating with me, with the origin of which I had nothing to do, and about which I knew nothing until it came to us from the House of Representatives, where the provision was inserted on the motion of the distinguished gentleman who then represented that district—whenever I have undertaken in any way to have the law carried out, the outcry has been at once, "You have a quarrel about that." What quarrel? I have no quarrel with anybody on earth except those who set the law at defiance. All I ask is that the law may be executed and observed. When the appropriation bill came here last year, making an appropriation of $25,000 for building a hospital at Kittery, it was said to me, "You have got a quarrel down there;" and I think the gentleman who was then at the head of the Committee on Finance reported from that committee that the appropriation should be stricken out on the ground that we had a quarrel. I do not know what they mean by a quarrel. I have no quarrel with them. All on earth I ask or ever have asked is that the plain, explicit, undeniable provisions of law should be carried out and executed; that the Portsmouth navy-yard, which is the best and deepest harbor on this continent—a yard where ships can float in tide-water of thirty-five feet at low tide, and the water along the land immediately adjacent has the same depth; I have only asked that an appropriation for the accommodation of that yard shall be carried out. There the land necessary can be purchased at $500 an acre, and the appropriation was made on that basis; but that law has not been carried out, and the Department have gone to Charlestown, that has not half so good a harbor, and bought land at $50,000 an acre, and not content with that, have offered to buy more which speculators had got hold of for the purpose of selling to the Government. I simply say that it seems to me there ought to be some power somewhere to see that injustice is not done, and that the laws of Congress are carried out.

This is all I am going to say about that subject, and I have now a few words to say in regard to the matter immediately pending before the Senate, which is the amendment submitted by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] for the establishment of a naval board. I do not know much about naval boards; I have no great confidence that any great good will come out of this proposition if it be adopted; but of one thing I am absolutely certain, that it cannot be any worse than what we have now. The fact which was disclosed by the Senator from Ohio upon the floor of the Senate yesterday is one of the most disgraceful facts to be found in the history of any civilized nation on God's earth. What is it? We have, being in a war with the rebels, made an appropriation to build twenty ships-of-war. The nation is waiting for them; impatient for them. What has been done? The Department goes on and builds those twenty ships-of-war, and when they are done, twenty of the blocks of marble that are now being used in the construction of your Capitol would be just as good for the purpose for which the ships were intended, that is, for floating. Twenty ships were built that would not float.

The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] yesterday deprecated the idea of any action being taken here on testimony that the honorable Senator from Ohio said was yet in cipher, in stenography, and still he said that there had been some evidence submitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs that these vessels were very excellent for something, he did not say what. I am glad of it. I shall be pleased, when that evidence comes out, to know what it is they are good for.

That they can be made to float I have no doubt. So can a grindstone be made to float if you will frame buoyant stuff enough around it to make it float; and I suppose these vessels will float in the same way. But for the purpose for which they were intended, light-draught monitors with turrets carrying guns, if the testimony referred to by the honorable Senator from Ohio is to be credited, they are utterly worthless, and are an entire failure. The committee of which he is chairman were instructed to inquire who were responsible for the plans of these vessels, and I am sorry that we have not got their report.

When we are in the midst of this struggle for the national life, and when the Navy is the right arm with which the national life is to be sustained; when, as I showed you last year, we are making appropriations for our naval armament equal to those of the whole civilized world, how is it that we have in the Navy Department no power, no skill, no talent to tell whether when a vessel is built it will swim or sink? Is it not a humiliating fact for this nation to be pouring out its treasure as it has poured it out for the building of vessels that, for all practical purposes for which they were wanted, are, to say the least, a total and entire failure? Mr. President, it is one of the most humiliating facts that the history of this war or the history of this world presents, that in this day of light, this age of science, when so much has been done for naval architecture and naval armament, such a fleet as this should be built at such expense, and the only voyage it can possibly take is from the surface to the bottom of the sea.

I do not know, Mr. President, that I can remedy these things; I do not know that there is any remedy. Perhaps I may be accused of hostility to the Administration because I point out with the faithfulness of a friend these gross, enormous, outrageous errors. Mr. President, shall we shut our eyes, shall we be blind, to any failure? I should not be astonished if, in the course of a short time, we should have a resolution introduced thanking the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for the consummate skill, profound science, and great foresight with which he planned these twenty light-draught iron-clad monitors!

Mr. President, I believe that we have a country to serve as well as a party, and I believe that it is the duty of a man who recognizes the claims of country above party, with the voice of truth and fidelity to stand up and point out these things. It is a thankless job. No man gets any thanks for it. It is an unpleasant job; but it is like that which is required of the faithful physician who, when the patient is wounded, seeks with the fidelity of a friend to probe the wound that its rottenness may be exposed and healing commence. That is what I have endeavored to do. I believe that we want reformation. I do not know that it will come. I do not know but that the purpose of God in reference to this nation is something like that which it is said He entertained toward His chosen people of old when He thinned out the army of Gideon and reduced it to a handful, so that when salvation came it might not be said that it came by man's strength or man's wisdom, but it came from the good hand of God. Well, sir, if we succeed, as I have no doubt we shall, for I have no doubt, notwithstanding we built iron-clad monitors to go to the bottom of the sea, that there is enough of energy left, despite such blundering, there is enough of skill despite such ignorance, there is enough left in the country and in the Navy to do what the country expects of it.

Mr. President, one of the emperors of Rome was elevated to the purple from having been a Thracian peasant; and Gibbon remarks of him that the emperor never forgave those who, under the humble garb of a Thracian peasant, did not recognize the latent dignity of an emperor. Sir, there are some of the bravest, and the truest, and the most patriotic men of our Navy who are suffering the cruelest injustice to-day because they did not have the like sagacity when the present Assistant Secretary of the Navy was a midshipman. That I know. I do not know that I can induce any reform; but, sir, the world was not made in a day, and I do not think it will go out in a day. If I cannot reform these things, if I cannot induce the Government to apply a corrective, I want to hold them up in a moral pillory, where the indignation of coming ages shall blast them, and blast them forever. That is my purpose, Mr. President. I want to be just; and I tell you that in the struggle which you are carrying on you want not only all the bravery, and all the patriotism, and all the courage of your sons on land and sea, but you want all the skill, all the science, that you can possibly command, to meet the tremendous emergencies of this day and this hour.

Mr. President, the day for quackery and imposture and pretension and ignorance ought to have passed, and passed long ago. I do not think it is too much to say that if in the place of the qualities I have just named we had had that science which we might have commanded, if we had had the science and the skill and the ability which are abundant in this country, and we had used it, the pecuniary saving would have been astounding; $500,000,000 would not pay what the country has sacrificed in employing quackery instead of science.

Mr. President, as I said before, I take no pleasure in these things, other than the pleasure of performing my duty, a painful duty, not a pleasant one. I am about to leave the Senate. I came into the Senate alone; nobody sympathized with the peculiar views that I entertained; and, God helping me, I believe I shall have to go out of it alone. In regard to these views which I entertain, and which I think ought to be applied to the administration of this Government, I have—I do not like to say it, but I cannot help it—an uncomfortable way of telling the truth. I am like the old fellow who once said, when called upon to make an apology before his daughters, "You must not mind what I say; because I am one of those plain old fellows who always say what they think." It is so with me. I came here alone, and, as I said, I am about to go out alone.

Let me say a word now about our Republican party or our Union party. I know that the chairman of the Committee on Finance is growing a little impatient, but I beg his pardon while I continue a little longer. Mr. President, the history of that party which has controlled this country recently, I do not say it controls it now, but the history of that party which made the great revolution in politics is a very curious and a very instructive one. We began when we were but a handful. I recognize around me now but very few faces that were familiar in those early conflicts and struggles; but we went on. We were defeated; we expected to be, and we went to work and prepared to be defeated again the next year. We expected it and we got it; we were not disappointed. We were not a "healthy political organization," as was said on this floor. By and by, however, we began to increase little by little, but still we only increased to be defeated. The party with which I acted at that time wanted a candidate for the Presidency. They wanted a man who was ready to be abused, vilified, denounced, sneered at. They wanted a man who should be a mark, a butt for the ridicule of Whigs and Democrats. I thank my friends that they did me the honor to select me for that place. I stood up at a time when ignominy and reproach was all that was within my possible reach. Still we increased. In the first place we beat the Whig party in 1852, or we did a very considerable part toward it. Do you remember, sir, a remark that Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, made on this floor? There was no Whig in the United States who deplored the destruction of the Whig party more than Mr. R. M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, for, said he, and it did great credit to his sagacity, "if you put down the Whig party, the probability is that you will get another party in its place that it will not be so easy to beat."

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator if Mr. Hunter's expression was not in this form, that if they put down the Whig party they would get another party in its place that would have no such honest principles and purposes as the Whig party.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt that is the way the Senator from Kentucky would have expressed it if he had been talking about it at that time, [laughter,] but that is not the way I understand it; that is not according to my recollection. However, sir, we continued to increase, and by and by it began to look as if this new party would at length, at some time, have the loaves and fishes of office to dispense. Then it seemed as if a new political Pentecost came on the land. Converts came faster than we could discipline them. The doors of the party were wide open like the sanctuary of God to all offenders, and the thief and the hypocrite did not stumble on its threshold, but in they came; and the profligate in life, the venal in politics, the malignant at heart, and the brutal in manner, all came in with the great multitude of the poor and the honest and the disinterested and the patriotic. But, sir, when the apostles went fishing and threw out their nets and made a great haul, they caught fish of every kind. So all these people came in and we were a great party. It happened to us just as it has happened to a great many before, and will happen a great many times again: the converts that were the most recent and from the most bitter of our opponents were the most noisy in professions of zeal for their new-found faith. I confess, Mr. President, that I was astonished beyond measure when I found out after we actually came into power that all the officers at the other end of the avenue, in the Treasury, the Post Office, the War, and all the other Departments, had always been Republicans, and the great trial of their life had been to smother their deep convictions upon the subject of anti-slavery, and their great joy was that in the providence of God a time had come when there was no obligation on them to be hypocrites any longer, but when they could act with the party with which they had always sympathized. [Laughter.]

That has been our experience. Well, sir, these new men got in, and they began to say to the older, though certainly not the better soldiers: "You have performed your mission; the Opposition was a good place for you; you were capital for denouncing the Democrats, and you put them down; but we do not think upon the whole that you are quite so good to run this machine as we." Very good, sir, we acceded to the propriety of the proposition, and the history of the country is demonstrating the truth that history has demonstrated a thousand times before—it is the history of politics, it is the history of humanity, it is the history of the world.

Mr. CONNESS. A law of nature.

Mr. HALE. Yes, it is with some natures. That is a fact, it is a law of nature. I do not mention these things to find fault with them. I am perfectly content that things shall be as they are. I believe that we are not governed entirely by accident, but that there is a Providence in these matters, that Providence shapes our ends and guides the means by which they are to be brought about.

But, Mr. President, in conclusion let me say that I invite the Assistant Secretary of the Navy to send another commission to Portsmouth; and if he would like them to go to Dover I will treat them as handsomely as I once promised a Senator from Mississippi I would treat him if he would come to New Hampshire, and he may "camp" on my "track," and when he finds anything that will impeach my integrity, or throw a shadow of doubt on my perfect purity in anything that relates to this Government I will consent that this committee shall be entertained as they are now entertained in a style of princely and costly extravagance at the Continental Hotel, in Philadelphia, in a manner of which, I am informed, the present Secretary of the Navy has said that if the bills were published they would disgrace the Department. I do not know that that is so; I have no evidence of it; that is to say, I have no evidence that I should be willing to bring forward; I believe it, though.

Now, sir, in regard to this bill, I do not know that I shall vote against it. I did ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance for what $250,000 was wanted for the contingent expenses of the Department; and his answer—it was a sufficient one, and fully satisfied him and satisfied me—was that it was the same sum that had always been appropriated. I am willing that it shall be expended under the judicious or injudicious arrangement of the Department, as the emergencies of the country may require. But, sir, there are some other things about the Navy Department with which I am not entirely in accord. You have a law on your statute-books authorizing certain individuals, I think, who have received the thanks of Congress by name, to be appointed rear admirals in the Navy, and providing some other qualifications for these appointments, which I do not now remember, and I have not the law before me. How has it been executed? The Secretary of the Navy has created a new office, which is exactly equal to it. By simply prefixing the word "acting," it does not require anything else, he may take out of the line of promotion, as he does, any individual that his caprice, his partiality, his whim, may suggest, and call him an "acting rear admiral," an office not known to the law, and by virtue of which he may put money in his pocket beyond the hopes of the most ambitious; and it has been done.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform the Senate in what cases that has occurred?

Mr. HALE. Where the Secretary has appointed acting rear admirals?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Senator does not ask that question for his own information.

Mr. GRIMES. I do. I am not conscious of its having been done. During this session—it is a matter that has passed now out of executive session, and I suppose it is not improper for me to speak of it here—we have confirmed two men that were sent to us as flag-officers, Commodore Stribling and Commodore Pearson; under the authority vested in the Secretary of the Navy by the law of Congress. He has the express authority to select any officer from any grade and put him in command of a fleet or squadron wherever he pleases. Such officers have chosen to assume the title of "acting rear admiral," as the post captains were in the habit before the law of 1863 was passed of calling themselves "commodores," and yet a commodore was then a mere title of courtesy. So "acting rear admiral" is a mere title of courtesy; but those officers are called in the law "flag officers."

Mr. HALE. They have called themselves "acting rear admirals," and they are so called by the Secretary of the Navy, in his communications, again and again.

Mr. GRIMES. It is a mere title of courtesy that is conferred by giving them command, exactly as the title of "commodore" was conferred before the grade of rear admiral was created by giving a post captain the command of a squadron. That is all there is of it.

Mr. HALE. Perhaps it may be, but I do not think it is all there is of it. By virtue of his own authority, and without any law, he has created the office of acting rear admiral, and the Senate and the country and the world will so see it and so read it; and he has done it more than once.

But, sir, I am not going to arraign the administration of the Navy Department generally; there is enough of it to attack, God knows. Now that I am up I will say (as a great many people have endeavored to make this a personal matter with me) that I have no personal feeling about it, and I will say a word in regard to the Secretary. I believe Secretary Welles to be a pure and honest man. I have lately seen a picture that purported to be a cartoon of a great naval picture that is to be put up somewhere in the Capitol, and I called on the chairman of the Committee on the Library and he assured me upon honor—no he did not add those words; but he said it with all the seriousness with which he could say it—that the Committee on the Library knew nothing about it; they had approved no such plan for any picture to be put up in any part of the Capitol, and I believed him; I had not the slightest doubt about it. If I had been going to draw a plan that should represent the true state of things, I would not have had a fox with his paws over the eyes of the Secretary—I think it is libelous; it is unjust—I would have had the Assistant Secretary of the Navy elevated somewhat above the level of the Senate with a whip in his hand, and whenever a witness was summoned before any committee of investigation of the Senate, I would have had the Assistant Secretary crack him with his whip, and if any Senator moved in his place any investigation into anything which he might have been pleased to do, I would have had the Assistant Secretary at once "camp on his track" and send a committee to hunt him up. That would have been the picture that would have represented to my mind more nearly, more vividly, and more actively, the truth than the one which has been suggested but which I am happy to hear is a libel.

Mr. President I have almost done. I do not expect that I shall convince or convert anybody, but I have done one thing if nothing else; I have, as our Methodist brethren say, "freed my mind" on this subject. [Laughter.] I have said what was in my heart and what I am sorry was compelled to be there. I have endeavored to perform the duty which has devolved upon me, and to do it without fear, favor, affection, or the hope of reward.

Mr. President, if there was a man in the United States who felt inclined by all the impulses of his heart, by all the instincts of his life, by all the promptings of his education, to sympathize heart and soul, earnestly and zealously, with this Administration in its great work of putting down the rebellion and sustaining the cause of the Union, it was my humble self. I had given a score of the best years of my life in the humble sphere in which God placed me to the advocacy of the sentiments which received the commendation of a majority of the American people in the election of Mr. Lincoln. If there was a man in the world—I say it humbly but confidently—who had a right from the position in which Providence had placed him, to rejoice with joy unfeigned at the result of Mr. Lincoln's election, it was myself; and I confess that when he came in I wanted no office and asked none for myself or for my friends, but I felt that the greatest boon which God could bestow upon a political man had been given to me, and the friends that with me had labored early, in season and out of season, day and night. I felt that the principles that were dear to our hearts, and for which we had struggled so long, had at length succeeded, and I do not believe that within the whole United States—and I say it though perhaps I should not—there was a single man ready to sustain with a more unshrinking and unselfish devotion the Administration that then came into power than I was; and I was not driven into any position of equivocation from that position in regard to any single Department of the Government until I saw that the frauds which I had condemned early and late, loud and long, everywhere under the Democratic Administration were not entirely purged out in the new order of things. I felt hurt, I felt hurt as I believe few men could be, when I saw the Secretary of the Navy retaining the same corrupt tools who had received the censure of the House of Representatives upon the report of my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]—a report not aimed directly at the then Secretary of the Navy verbally, but at the agents who were guilty of the atrocities which he condemned, and which the House, by a two-thirds vote, censured; and yet those agents were retained in the same places to do the same work over again.

Mr. President, the Navy Department has had a curious history. All Senators, of course, are familiar with the description of the Vicar of Bray. His peculiarity was that, let who would be king he would be Vicar of Bray. That has been so with the Navy Department. Let who would be in, Polk, Taylor, Fillmore, Pierce, Buchanan, Lincoln, the Navy Department has been just the same under them all, with the exception that Lenthall, upon whom the censure of the Senator from Ohio, when he was a member of the other House, fell most directly, instead of having been simply let alone, has been promoted, a new bureau has been created for him, and he has illustrated the propriety and the wisdom of that selection by having constructed a whole fleet of iron-clad vessels that can make their way to no port under heaven this side the bottom of the ocean. I say the Navy Department has remained unmoved; there is the Vicar of Bray; there it stands; there it has been in the past and there it is to-day.

Now, Mr. President, I may be asked what is the use, what the benefit of all this talk. Let me tell you an anecdote. On one occasion the Senate of the United States deemed it its duty to pay peculiar honor to some Irishman—I have forgotten his name—one of the Irish refugees who came over here. I believe it was not John Mitchell, but I do not know but that it was. [Laughter.] Well, sir, on that occasion I felt a little patriotic Irish blood in me, and I took the opportunity to say that I was of Irish origin. I did not demonstrate it by saying that my mother was an Irishman, [laughter,] but I said that she was an Irishwoman. That was published in the papers and went home, and a particular friend of mine read it, and said she, "Suppose it was so, what need was there of your telling it." [Laughter.]

You may ask me, if these things are so in the Navy Department, what necessity is there for telling them. I do not know; it may possibly benefit some of these gentlemen; they may get promoted; there may be some new bureau created for some of them that have been expert in arranging these prices so as to accommodate their friends to any measure their rapacity might induce them to go. There may be some new office created for them, and it may be a benefit to them. Mr. President, whatever may be the consequence of it for weal or for woe, I declare that I am not and never will be a friend to that policy which hides and covers up persistent errors of friend or foe.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not know how the speech of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] has impressed others, but one thing I know, that I have been very much delighted at it. Sir, I recollect that when this party came into power, and when it was struggling for power, the good old glorious Democratic party and its representatives told the people of the country not to listen to its siren song. We told the people then that the Republican party was trying to get possession of the Government of this country by false pretenses. The Republican politicians were telling the people that the Administration of Mr. Buchanan had cost $90,000,000 in a single year; that there were great corruptions in the Democratic party; and they therefore appealed to the people in their indignation to rise up and turn the corrupt Democratic party out of power. We told them that if they listened to these political adventurers, and they got control of the Government of this country, fraud and corruption would be their stock in trade. And now, sir, we have been delighted to-day in hearing one of the earliest champions of that party arise on the floor of the Senate of the United States, and in Methodist love-feast style make confession of the sins of himself and his whole party.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from New Hampshire said that he was in the position of the Methodist who had relieved his mind. Let me tell him that his speech reminds me of a scene that I have been informed once occurred in a Methodist love-feast; and we all know who the Methodists are; I think they are among the best people in the world. We know that they have a habit of having class-meetings and love-feasts, and in my State on one occasion they met in a little school-house and held their class. The leader came along and asked brother A how he was progressing in spiritual life. Brother A rose and said that he must confess that he was a poor, insignificant creature; that from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet he was naught but wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores; and down he sat. A cruel picture he had given of himself. There was no song sung, but the leader passed on in mournful mood to the next brother and asked him to give an account of his spiritual life, and he rose and said, "As to myself, brother Leader, I have nothing to say, but I can bear most willing testimony that everything that brother A has said in reference to himself is literally and strictly true." [Laughter.] So, sir, on this occasion I have nothing to say myself further than that every word that brother HALE has said in regard to his party in my judgment is literally and strictly true. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I wish the country to take note of this. We gave them full warning four years ago that if the now dominant party—dominant in power, but not more numerous in numbers, as would have been shown if there had been a fair expression of the popular will at the last election—obtained the reins of power, instead of some sixty, or seventy, or ninety millions of dollars being spent in a year, the amount would reach hundreds of millions. And we said more—I mean no personal offense; but the honorable Senator said that however unpopular it was he must speak the truth, and I am now simply speaking the truth—we told the people then that if this party ever got into power they would steal more in one year from the public Treasury than any Democratic Administration had expended during its continuance. And let me say here that the thanks of the country are due to a distinguished member of the other House from Massachusetts who admitted the fact that in the first year of this Republican Administration more had been stolen from the public Treasury than had been expended during the whole of Mr. Buchanan's Administration.

Mr. President, let me say to-day, in my place in the Senate of the United States, in the presence of the country, that such expositions as the honorable Senator from New Hampshire has made of his party this day caused me to be glad and to rejoice that I was born in the good old Democratic party, that pure and glorious party that commenced almost with the birth of the country and never ceased to exist until its country died. I have sat here day after day and from year to year, and heard the party whose portrait the honorable Senator from New Hampshire has so justly drawn represented as the great Union party of the country, and I have heard the party to which every ancestor I ever had since the birth of parties in this country belonged, the good old Democratic party, into which I was born and in connection with which I mean to die, denounced as a disloyal and a disunion party. Sir, I say again, looking at the photograph presented to the Senate by the great artist from New Hampshire, that I and every other Democrat have cause this day to rejoice that we belong to that good, noble party, for, thank God! though its counsels cannot now be heeded, the history of the country having shown that it and it alone is able to guide the ship of State through the tempestuous billows into havens of safety, it shall yet rise, and rejoicing thousands shall say to it when again it shall launch forth on the broad ocean:

"Sail on, sail on, O ship of State,
Sail on, O party strong and great;
Humanity with all its fears,
With all its hopes of future years;
Is hanging breathless on thy fate.
We know what masters laid thy keel,
What workmen wrought thy ribs of steel,
Who made each mast, and sail, and rope,
What anvils rung, what hammers beat,
In what a forge and what a heat
Were shaped the anchors of thy hope.
Fear not each sudden sound and shock,
'Tis of the wave and not the rock.
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale.
In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea,
Our hearts, our hopes are all with thee;
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our hopes triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee, are all with thee."

That same party shall again, sir, in the providence of God, if He has not entirely forsaken this people, be restored to power, and its counsels yet shall be the counsels of the nation; for a grateful people, after being instructed by afflictions and humiliated by sufferings, will recollect that when that party assumed the helm of power we numbered not five million people and we numbered only about fifteen States, but in the brief period of sixty years we increased to thirty million people and to thirty-four States. And, sir, let me tell you that the history of the Republican party is written in the words dismemberment and destruction, and that of the Democratic party was written in union, in strength, in the addition of star to star to our national galaxy.

Am I wrong, sir? That same old Democratic party took the banner of your Union and planted it upon the territory of Florida, and it was annexed to the Federal Union. That same Democratic party took the same good old banner of Union and planted it on the virgin soil of Louisiana, an empire in itself, and that was annexed to the national domain. Texas, a vast empire, was added. Westward still the star of empire took its way, and, true to its great mission of national development and national glory, it took that same noble flag of the Union and planted it upon the Pacific shore, and California, Utah, and New Mexico are yours forever, unless by your own unwise counsels you deprive yourselves of them. Every foot of national territory that has ever been added to the American domain has been under the counsels and the guidance of the same good old Democratic party; and now that you have succeeded in displacing it and you have inaugurated a new party, boisterous and loud in its professions of retrenchment and reform, we have the spectacle of one of its earliest champions rising upon the floor of the Senate and confessing for it that it is naught, from the crown of its head to the sole of its foot, but wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores. It is just what we said of your party before it came into power; it is just what the judgment of future ages will say.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I had intended to make some remarks in reply to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, confining myself entirely to those matters of investigation which were entered upon by the committee of the Senate of which he was chairman and I was a member; but the speech of the Senator from Delaware for a moment challenges my attention, and a few facts briefly and very concisely stated will show that the whole speech of that gentleman is founded upon nothing; it is mere declamation, sound, without any foundation in truth.

Now, I say to my honorable friend from Delaware, for personally these are our relations, that the Democratic party by name is a party of very modern origin. I remember long before it was born; I was present at its christening. I propose in a moment to strip off this vail which covers what are claimed sometimes to be the glorious antecedents of the great Democratic party. What is the fact, Mr. President? In 1798 the Republican party was originated, and Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and the great statesmen of that period were its founders. In 1800 the Republican party elected Jefferson President for four years. In 1804 the Republican party elected Jefferson again for four years more. In 1808 it was the Republican party which elected Mr. Madison as President of the United States. In 1812 the Republican party elected Madison a second time President of the United States. In 1816 the Republican party elected Monroe as President, and again in 1820 elected him without any opposition whatever. The party opposed to the Republican party during all that period from 1800 to 1820 was the Federal party, and in 1820 the Federal party as such yielded up its existence, and in 1824 there were four candidates for the Presidency, every one of them running as Republicans, not as Democrats. Mr. Crawford was the nominee of the regular caucus in 1824; General Jackson ran as an independent Republican candidate from Tennessee; Mr. Clay as an independent Republican candidate from Kentucky; and Mr. Adams as an independent Republican candidate from New England, for he at that time had given in his adhesion to the Republican party. In 1824 there was no choice for President by the people; it went to the House of Representatives, and Mr. Adams was chosen as President. In 1828, General Jackson, nominated by the people, not as a Democratic candidate but as the people's candidate and as a Republican, was elected President of the United States; and in 1832, for the first time in the history of the country, was the assumption given to the Republican party, or that branch of it which supported General Jackson, of the Democratic Republican party. It was a contrivance of Mr. Van Buren to secure, not the nomination of General Jackson, but his own nomination as Vice President under him. It was when the first national convention that was ever held in the United States, called also at the instigation of Mr. Van Buren and his friends, and then for the first time that branch of the Republican party which supported General Jackson assumed the name of Democratic Republicans. It 1836 it assumed the same; in 1840 the same; and from that period gradually it began to drop the name of "Republican" and it was called the Democratic party. But, sir, as the Whig party in 1850, by the issues of that day, was dissolved and buried in the tomb of Webster and Clay, its great champions and representatives, so the Democratic party, when it drew that fatal knife which severed the silver cord and broke the golden bowl of peace, when it drew that fatal knife which destroyed the Missouri compromise, dissolved also and went into fragments, and upon the ruins of all those parties sprang into existence with the newness of life the Republican party based upon the ideas of the old Republican party of Jefferson and Madison, and to those ideas it stands pledged and has from the beginning; and I tell my friend from Delaware that the true, real Republican party, based upon truth as its foundation, in the nature of things never dies, and it never will. And, sir, if we who represent that party this day in the administration of affairs are but true to the principles upon which it reorganized itself in 1854, and again in 1856, and triumphed in 1860, it is to hold the control of the destinies of this country for a generation to come; but if it is false to those principles we shall pass away the false representatives of the true, genuine Republican party, ay, sir, the real Democratic party of this country, as it is this day its true representative and champion.

But, Mr. President, I have been drawn too far in what I have now said by the remarks of the Senator from Delaware. I proposed to say a few words, and but a few, by way of reply to some portion of the remarks of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, and I shall confine myself in these remarks to the investigation which was ordered by the Senate by a committee, and upon which I was placed as a member, and of which he was chairman. In the first place, let me say, that committee agreed in a report in this: they recommended to Congress the passage of a law which would authorize the Department, whenever bids were put in for a price more than ten per cent., in the judgment of the Department, above the market price, to refuse to accept those bids. Under the law as it originally stood, the Department was bound to accept the lowest bids, whatever might be the price. In 1863, the law was amended so as to provide that the Department should not be bound to accept fictitious or nominal bids. If articles were bid for at a mere nominal price the bids might be disregarded. It might be that iron might be offered at one dollar per ton when it was known to be worth twenty or thirty dollars in the market, and the Department was authorized to reject such a bid as fictitious and nominal. But under this word "fictitious," it was found at the Department to be impossible to determine whether certain bids should or should not be rejected. You could not claim that a bid put in for a specific article, when the price named by the bidder was fifty per cent. above its market value, was a fictitious bid. You could not say that was a nominal bid. The truth is that the change in our currency, the great expansion of our currency, by which the nominal prices of everything have changed so rapidly, and have within two or three years doubled and more than doubled in some instances, has had the effect of demonstrating that those bidders who sometimes put in their bids for fifty per cent. or even one hundred per cent. above the market price were wise men, prudent men; and they are not to be condemned because they made their bids at these high prices, as the result has shown.

But all the committee concurred in recommending that Congress should pass a law authorizing the Department to reject any article out of the lists of bids when it should appear satisfactorily to the Department that the amount at which it was bid for was more than ten per cent. above its market value, believing that if the Department were clothed with that power they could prevent themselves from being imposed upon, as they had hitherto been imposed upon under the laws as they existed.

But, Mr. President, in relation to the facts which were disclosed before the committee, there was a difference of opinion between the different members of the committee. For myself I maintain that upon that evidence there is no proof which goes to show the fact that any person employed in that Department has been guilty of any offense whatever, or of any violation of his official integrity. I do not say that contracts may not have been imposed upon the Department from the fact that the bids that were put in were sometimes for great prices, enormous prices, some of them twice the market value. But, sir, what I stand here to say—and I feel it my duty to say it to the Senate and to the people of the country—is, that there was no evidence disclosed on that investigation which shows any want of official integrity in any person employed in the Navy Department; for it was to that subject that we particularly gave our attention; and I will refer to the persons by name whose bureaus were examined.

As to the chief of the Department, the Secretary himself, I believe it is not pretended, and never has been by any person, that there were any facts disclosed in that investigation going to throw the slightest shadow of suspicion upon his official integrity in any way whatever. And as to the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Fox, between whom and the Senator from New Hampshire, it would appear from the speech certainly of the Senator, no very friendly relations exist, there is no proof in the testimony taken before that committee which in any way whatever reflects upon the character of Mr. Fox for personal integrity. I will ask the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, if in his recollection there is any word of testimony disclosed on that investigation that bears upon his official or personal integrity as a man. So, Mr. President, in relation to Faxon, who is the chief clerk in that Department. Witnesses were questioned to ascertain whether Mr. Faxon had ever in any way received any consideration or in any manner whatever performed his duties as chief clerk of the Department improperly, and I undertake to say, and the Senator from New Hampshire will not controvert me when I say it, there is no evidence before the committee, as will be seen on referring to the report, that goes to show anything bearing on the integrity of Mr. Faxon. So in relation to Admiral Smith, the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks; I undertake to say there is nothing in this report detailed upon which the Senator from New Hampshire or anybody else can put down his finger and say, "I charge upon Admiral Smith a violation of his official duties," or "I charge upon him a want of official integrity in the performance of these duties." So too in relation to Mr. Isherwood. If you look through the whole of this testimony you will see that there is nothing which in the slightest degree goes to affect the official integrity of Mr. Isherwood until you come to that testimony which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire read, and to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment, and which when it is seen in its true light, so far from casting any suspicion on the integrity of Mr. Isherwood, shows on the other hand that Mr. Isherwood was a faithful and diligent and efficient officer in the discharge of his duties in that very respect. We had gone on for months taking testimony, listening to the witnesses as they were questioned, nothing appearing whatever to cast the slightest shade, until just at the close of the examination Mr. Murdock was called and this question was put to him by the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the committee:

"State any facts in your knowledge which tend to prove that bidders at the several bureaus of the Navy Department may have had any knowledge of any bids before their were put in."

Murdock made this answer:

"At the opening of the bids in the Bureau of Steam Engineering, early in the spring of 1863—I cannot give the exact date—there were bids received and accepted on the day after the bids generally had been opened and entered on the schedules, and by parties who were present at the day of the opening, the day previous. Among them I remember bids from Mr. Stover for classes at the Washington yard, in connection with others which I cannot now call to mind. I remember, too, that he had no bids for that yard entered on the schedule on the day of the opening, and that all the bids which were deposited and accepted on the morning after were successful. I remember, too, that Mr. Neally, who had charge of the bids, threw out one or two classes on account of the prices being exorbitant. He took the responsibility to throw them out himself, for the reason that there were no other bidders for the class but Mr. Stover."

"At the two openings when I was present, but more especially the opening of June of last year, there were a large number of persons present, and every one in the room had the liberty to take the bids after they had been opened and read and examine them, and even to take them out of the room into an adjoining room; and I remember distinctly that Mr. Ellis, who had a bid in for two or three classes, came to me and protested against the thing being allowed, for the reason that there was a party whom he did not know in the room, who had all his bids, and was sitting at Mr. Isherwood's table with a pen in his hand, copying and examining the bids. And there were times when every person in the room had bids of their own or others in their hands, which they read and examined at their leisure."

That statement of Mr. Murdock, on its face, would seem to show that Isherwood, on the day after his bids had been received and opened, was receiving bids from some other person, and, as a matter of course, if it were true it would show that Isherwood ought to be punished with the severest penalties of the law; but now what are the facts? I desire specially to call your attention, Mr. President and Senators, to the facts. When the advertisements were issued for those bids they were all issued by Mr. Lenthall, because at the time when they were issued the bureau of which he was the head, the Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repair, had not been divided, the Bureau of Engineering had not been taken from it, that being then a branch of Mr. Lenthall's bureau; but by the time the bids came in the business was so great that the bureau had been subdivided, and Isherwood was put in charge of one branch, that of steam engineering, Mr. Lenthall retaining the other branches; and when the bids came in many of them came to Lenthall's bureau, which were for classes belonging to the bureau of which Mr. Isherwood was the head. Immediately upon recalling to the stand Mr. Isherwood, and Mr. Farwell, who was the chief clerk in Lenthall's bureau, the facts appeared. Mr. Farwell swears positively that the very bid to which Murdock referred was deposited on the first day in the bureau of Mr. Lenthall, and it was in the hands of Mr. Lenthall, and Mr. Farwell himself took that bid to Mr. Isherwood's bureau and presented it first to Mr. Neally, who was Mr. Isherwood's chief clerk. Neally at first refused to receive it, because it came too late. Farwell then presented it to Mr. Isherwood, the chief of the bureau, telling him what the facts were. Murdock was present when this witness testified to these facts, and when Mr. Isherwood also testified to them, and on having his attention again called to the subject he states that the facts were precisely as Farwell and Isherwood had stated them. Let me give the words of the witnesses. The reply of Mr. Murdock to the question of the Senator from New Hampshire was on the 1st of June. On the next day he was examined by me, and I will read his testimony:

"Question. Was not the bureau then under Mr. Lenthall called the Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repair? Was it not all one bureau at the time of the advertising?"

"Answer. I do not know whether it was or not. I only know that Mr. Lenthall issued the advertisement for the Bureau of Steam Engineering."

"Question. When the bids were put in, do you know whether some of them which were intended for the Bureau of Steam Engineering were delivered in fact to Mr. Lenthall?"

"Answer. I know there were some bids in Mr. Lenthall's bureau that belonged to the Bureau of Steam Engineering."

"Question. They had all been under one bureau previous to that time, and the advertising was issued by Mr. Lenthall's bureau?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. Was that the spring opening of 1863 of which you speak, the first opening made by the Bureau of Steam Engineering, of which Mr. Isherwood was chief?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. Now, to come more particularly to the transaction of which you spoke in relation to the bid put in by Mr. Brown in behalf of Stover; on having your attention more particularly called to it, do you remember the mistake which Brown asserted was the reason why the bid had not been handed in to Mr. Isherwood?"

"Answer. I remember, since having my attention called to the fact last evening, that the claim which he made was that the bid was deposited originally in Mr. Lenthall's bureau."

"Question. Did he claim that the bid had been delivered in time, delivered the day before?"

"Answer. He claimed that the bid had been delivered to Mr. Lenthall's bureau, and was found among his bids at the opening, whereas it ought to have been delivered to Mr. Isherwood."

Now, let me read Mr. Isherwood's testimony:

"B. F. Isherwood recalled and examined."

"By Mr. DOOLITTLE:

"Question. Do you remember the occasion of a bid being brought into your office the next morning after you commenced your opening, which was alleged to have been filed with Mr. Lenthall; a bid for Mr. Stover?"

"Answer. I have a very indistinct recollection of Mr. Farwell bringing some bid to me. Whether it was Mr. Stover's bid, or whose it was, I cannot now say. It has passed from my mind. I have been endeavoring to recollect the name, but I cannot. I know that he brought some bid that had been sent to their bureau with other bids, and upon opening it they finding that it belonged to my bureau, he brought it in to me. That was in my own office."

"Question. Where they had already been sent in in time, on the day fixed in the advertisement, did you ever give directions to have any bid received and sealed that was brought into the Department after the day fixed?"

"Answer. Never. I never received any that was offered after the opening commenced, not even on the same day. When the opening once commenced, when the first seal is broken, all further bids are excluded."

"Question. And any bid that may have been brought into your office after the opening commenced was a bid which had been filed by mistake in some other bureau of the Department, but filed in time?"

"Answer. These bids that we are now referring to in these two bureaus were opened on the same day. The bids for my bureau were comparatively few, quite insignificant compared with the others. We got through ours the first day. The other bureau took two days to open theirs, and, of course, until they did open them they could not tell to whom they belonged, nor to which branch of the bureau they ought to go."

"Question. The old bureau, under the charge of Mr. Lenthall, was a Bureau of Construction, Steam Engineering, and Repairs?"

"Answer. All the functions that now belong to the three distinct Bureaus of Construction, Equipment, and Steam Engineering, then belonged to the Bureau of Construction alone, which was under Mr. Lenthall."

"Question. Your bureau, which is the Bureau of Steam Engineering, branched off from his bureau just about this time?"

"Answer. It was a sub-office of his bureau previously, and had then just been erected into an independent bureau. This was the first bidding after the separation."

"Question. Who issued the advertisements for this bidding for both these branches of the old bureau?"

"Answer. Mr. Lenthall issued the advertisements for that bidding. All since have been issued by me."

"Question. Were the advertisements in this bidding issued just as they had previously been, as if it was but one bureau?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

I will next read Mr. Farwell's testimony in relation to that transaction:

"A. B. Farwell recalled and examined."

"By Mr. DOOLITTLE:

"Question. You were chief clerk of the bureau of which Mr. Lenthall was the head at the time of the advertisement spoken of, as I understand?"

"Answer. Yes, sir, I was."

"Question. You may state whether all the advertisements for that bidding of the early spring of 1863 were issued by your bureau, of which Mr. Lenthall was chief."

"Answer. They were all issued from our bureau."

"Question. Do you remember the circumstance of a certain bid that was put in by one Ainsworth Brown, in behalf of Stover, in the spring of 1863?"

"Answer. I remember that Mr. Ainsworth Brown brought all of Stover's bids there at that opening."

"Question. On what day did he bring the bids there?"

"Answer. He brought them there on the morning of the 13th of March, 1863, the morning on which the opening commenced."

"Question. Before any opening had taken place?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. With whom were they filed?"

"Answer. With Mr. Lenthall."

"Question. Brown acted as agent for Stover?"

"Answer. He said he was Mr. Stover's chief clerk."

"Question. I believe you have already stated that the openings by Mr. Lenthall were made in your presence?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. Do you remember the opening of Stover's bids in your bureau?"

"Answer. I do not remember the opening of Stover's bids any more distinctly than I do the opening of others. I remember that his were opened."

"Question. On the opening of those bids will you state whether you found that he had put in bids for matters which belonged to Mr. Isherwood's bureau, and for what yard?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; but I do not remember the yard. I only remember that in Mr. Stover's bids we found proposals belonging to Mr. Isherwood's bureau."

"Question. Can you state what was done with those bids that belonged to Mr. Isherwood's bureau?"

"Answer. That bid of Mr. Stover was opened on the second day of our openings."

"Question. You are sure it was filed on the first day?"

"Answer. Yes, sir, they were all filed together. We never took any bids into the bureau after we commenced opening; and when those are torn off they were found to contain bids for lettered classes. Our own bids were all for figure classes, and in the other two bureaus the classes were lettered. These were torn off by Mr. Lenthall, and he ordered me to take them into Mr. Isherwood's bureau. I did so, and offered them to Mr. Neally, Mr. Isherwood's chief clerk."

"Question. On which day did you take them in?"

"Answer. On the second day of our opening. When I got in there Mr. Neally declined to take them, saying that they had closed their opening. I said to him that Mr. Lenthall had torn them from our bids—that they belonged to his bureau. He said that, as they had got through, he would not take them, but I might hand them to Mr. Isherwood. Mr. Isherwood was then out, but he came in while I was there talking with Mr. Neally, and I handed them to him, saying 'These belong to your bureau,' and I immediately went out."

"Question. Do you remember whether Mr. Brown went in with you or not?"

"Answer. My recollection is that Mr. Brown came in while I was there; he came in while I was going out of the door, and he said he was going in to see that his bids were properly sealed."

"Question. Was Mr. Murdock there at the time?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; Mr. Murdock was sitting at what is called the engineer's desk, his back to us."

"Question. State what occurred—what did Brown say on the subject?"

"Answer. When I started to go out of the door Brown wanted me to say to Mr. Isherwood that they had been torn from our bids, as they were. I told him that I had already said that to Mr. Isherwood, and I recollect saying to Mr. Isherwood that my opinion was that they had better be sealed, and, if they had any doubts, submit the question to the Department whether they should be accepted."

"Question. What did Mr. Isherwood reply to that?"

"Answer. I think Mr. Isherwood told Mr. Neally to scale them, and they would afterward settle whether they ought to be received or not."

"Question. I understand you to say that you carried in those bids yourself, of Stover, and handed them to Mr. Neally?"

"Answer. I carried them in myself. I offered them to Mr. Neally. He declined to take them, and I then handed them to Mr. Isherwood. They never went into Brown's hands until they had been in Mr. Isherwood's. There were bids of many parties torn off in the same way for Mr. Isherwood's bureau and the Bureau of Equipment."

"Question. The bids came into your bureau, it would seem, just as they had formerly, before the division of the bureau; and then looking over those bids, seeing some for construction, some for engineering, and some for equipment, you separated the classes and sent them around to the different bureaus where they properly belonged?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. As to this particular bid of Stover's which Brown represented, are you positive that it was put in on the first day?"

"Answer. I am positive that it was put in there in the morning with all Stover's bids. They were all put in together by Mr. Brown. We never took a bid in our bureau after the openings commenced. Bids have been received at our bureau by mail arriving there the next day and have been sealed, leaving half a dozen lines between the regular scale and those that came in late, and the words 'Received too late' were marked opposite to them, and they were never considered in the awarding of contracts."

And then, after these witnesses had thus testified, Mr. Murdock was recalled.

"Ira Murdock recalled and examined."

"By Mr. DOOLITTLE:

"Question. On your hearing Mr. Farwell state the facts in relation to what occurred there, does your recollection agree with his as to what he states?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I should like to look at the scale of that bidding. [Scale shown to witness.] On examining the original scale, I find that Mr. Stover bid for four classes, that two were awarded to him, and on one class he was not a successful bidder. On the remaining class the bid was thrown out, there being no competitor and the price being exorbitant. On further reflection and examination of the scale, I desire to make this correction of the statement I made yesterday."

Mr. President, and Senators, when you come to look into this transaction and see it as it is, I undertake to say that there is not a shadow resting upon the official integrity of Mr. Isherwood. As to Mr. Lenthall there is certainly nothing within the lids of this volume which goes to reflect on his official integrity as an officer; nothing to show that there was any corruption or anything wrong, or at least any intentional wrong. He may have made mistakes, as other men make them; but that there was any intentional wrong on his part, or any corruption on his part, there is no evidence whatever to show.

Now, you may come down to the clerks in the Department. There was Mr. Farwell, who was the chief clerk of Mr. Lenthall's bureau. There was in the testimony given by Franklin W. Smith some hearsay evidence, which seemed for a moment to throw a suspicion upon Mr. Farwell. Smith stated to the committee that some other person had told him in the city of Boston that Farwell and Murdock, two of the clerks in the Department, had been purchasing some property near Boston and that their houses had been furnished, and intimating, not saying in so many words, that it was done for some kind of corrupt or improper services rendered by them in the Navy Department, they being clerks in that Department. When Mr. Pratt and Mr. Ellis, the two gentlemen who Mr. Smith said made this statement to him, were called upon the stand as witnesses, they denied that they had ever told Mr. Smith any such thing. It was mere hearsay anyhow. When Farwell and Murdock were called on the stand as witnesses and examined at length on these charges of their having purchased property or receiving something as a consideration for their action in the Department, I undertake to say that in their testimony they clearly and unequivocally explained it all, and there has not been a shadow resting on Farwell; and if suspicion rests on anybody it is on Murdock; but his testimony on this subject is clear and explicit.

I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate; but this point about corruption within the Navy Department and the corruption of the heads of bureaus and of clerks in the Department has been referred to so often that I feel called upon as a matter of duty both to these officers and to the country in whose service I am, that these charges so often repeated shall not go forth unchallenged to destroy the confidence of the people in the very officers that are administering the Government in this time of peril. On this subject Mr. Murdock was questioned, and I questioned him myself, among others. This is his testimony:

"By Mr. DOOLITTLE:

"Question. You say you reside in Bridgewater, Massachusetts; what is the name of the county?

"Answer. Plymouth county.

"Question. Did you purchase a house and lot at Bridgewater not long ago?

"Answer. Yes, sir. I held a mortgage on a house, and I took possession of it some year ago. The owner of the house was down in the southern country; he went there to live after the rebellion, and I think has been heard from not more than once or twice since he left.

"Question. Did he join the rebels, as you understand?

"Answer. I do not know that he did; it is supposed that he did. His wife could not carry on the place; circumstances were embarrassing at the time he left, and I paid her a certain sum of money, and took the house, with a guarantee from her brothers and his brothers in Boston—respectable men—that I should, at a certain time, receive a deed from him, which I have not received.

"Question. How much was your mortgage?

"Answer. About five thousand dollars.

"Question. And how much did you give her?

"Answer. Fifteen hundred dollars.

"Question. Do you know a gentleman in Boston by the name of Pratt, of the firm of Bowers, Pratt & Co.?

"Answer. Yes, sir; very well."

Mr. Pratt was the person who it was said had made the statement in relation to Murdock, that he could be purchased in the Department.

"Question. Has Mr. Pratt given to you, or to your wife or family, in any way, direct or indirect, anything in consideration of any favor you may have done him connected with the Department or the Government?

"Answer. Never a dollar."

And when you look into the testimony of Mr. Pratt and the testimony of Mr. Ellis, they both swear positively that no such thing ever did occur, and they never said to Smith that it did occur; and that, I confess, is one of those painful facts standing out in the case which have led me to doubt very much the good faith of this Smith in the testimony which he gave. These two witnesses swear positively that they never made to him any such statement as he stated they did; and the man himself swears positively that no such thing ever occurred. And what goes to show how perfectly baseless is this charge against the Department will appear when I tell you that this Mr. Murdock had not been in the employment of the Department for a whole year before the investigation began by this committee; and yet the investigation was sought upon the basis of charges of fraud and corruption in that Department of the Government, more dangerous to the country even than the enemies in the field.

Mr. President, I rose only to speak upon one point, and that was to defend the official integrity of the men in this Department against these wholesale and sweeping charges. I challenge any Senator on any side of this Chamber to name the man in the Department; and I say that if, after months of investigation, you have not the evidence upon which you can point to this man, or that man, or the other, and say to him, "Thou art the man; I charge you with corruption," every tongue should be silent on this subject of official corruption in the Navy Department. I do not stand here to say that all that has been transacted in the navy-yard at Charlestown or New York is free from any charge of corruption. I do not undertake to know what has transpired there. I will not make charges without proof, and I am unwilling that charges should be made unless they are based upon proof.

Among other things it has been urged that the administration of that Department has been inefficient. Sir, a single fact is sufficient to answer all that. In what condition was that Department when it was taken possession of by Mr. Welles and the men under him? In what condition was the naval force of this country at the breaking out of this rebellion? Sir, our naval force under the last Administration, which was in sympathy with this very rebellion, had been sent to the four quarters of the world; not a single vessel remained to us except the Brooklyn, and she, drawing fourteen feet of water, could not enter any harbor on the southern coast with the exception of one or two. They had been sent to the uttermost parts of the sea for the very purpose of disarming the Government and rendering it powerless in the great conflict. And what have we seen? Steadily under the administration of this much-abused Navy Department we have seen that naval power growing month by month. We have seen it victorious at Hilton Head. We have seen it victorious at New Orleans where the British and French admirals in command of their vessels in the Mississippi river at New Orleans declared that it was impossible for our naval vessels to be successful. We have seen it winning triumphs at Vicksburg, at Mobile, at Fort Fisher. Ay, Mr. President, under the direction and control of this much-abused Navy Department we have seen a naval force gathered together which, under the command of David Porter, in the attack upon Fort Fisher, had a power sufficient to have sunk the whole navy of Great Britain in six hours in a single fight. And all this great Navy has been gathered together in the short period of three or four years; and yet men speak of the inefficiency of the administration of the Navy Department. Sir, I go not into the details; I care not whether it is administered by the Secretary-in-chief or by his Assistant Secretary, it is administered by somebody who has brains, power, energy, and will, and it has accomplished in the putting down of this rebellion that for which the American people in their heart of hearts ought to declare their unbounded gratitude and their undying thanks.

Mr. President, I do not purpose at all to go into other matters on this occasion. The honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] is much better prepared than myself to speak upon the other great questions that have been raised in relation to the administration of this Department, and I shall forbear trespassing any longer upon the attention of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It was my purpose, Mr. President, to submit a few remarks in reply to that portion of the speech of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin which referred to the remarks I before submitted to the Senate; but since that he has gone off on a very cold scent, and the controversy has lost to me most of its interest. I cordially agree with the honorable Senator in his statement that our relations are those of personal kindness, and therefore I am sure he will take no personal exception to what I am about to say. The course he has pursued on this occasion only verifies a remark made by the photographer of the Republican party, the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. That honorable

Senator, in the course of the remarks in which he delineated so truthfully and so beautifully the character of the Republican party, said that he was one of its earliest champions, and now he found that the new converts to the party, and especially that portion of them who came from the Democratic party, were its most zealous defenders.

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin, in the remarks which he intended to be disparaging to the Democratic party, denied that the history of that party was as old, that its record was as honorable, as I had avowed it to be before the Senate. How many years has it been since that honorable Senator was a high-priest in Democratic councils? Sir, he has not tarried at the political Jericho of the Republican party sufficiently long for his beard to attain full growth. If I mistake not, he bore honorable commission to the national councils of the Democratic party. If I mistake not, he was one of its fiercest champions, and he bore aloft its banner in his own State at one time. Sir, I have never known it to fail, when a member of the Democratic party has left the party, that he has not said that he did not leave the party, but that the party left him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable gentleman is mistaken. The real Democratic party did not leave me; they came right along with me and helped to make the Republican party, and they are almost all in.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My only reply to that is that the old Republican party to which the Senator alludes had everything in the head and not "nigger on the brain," and the Republican party of the present day—I mean no personal offense—has nothing except "nigger on the brain."

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I do not wish to interrupt this interesting discussion; but I will at this period make a point of order. My point is that it is out of order, it is illegal to hold an inquest over the corpse of the Democratic party when the coroner is not present. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will answer the Senator in the course of the very few remarks which I propose to submit.

Sir, we have had a beautiful exhibition here today. An honorable Senator, whose effusions, or rather whose patriotic, noble, and thrilling eloquence in the other House as the champion of the Democratic cause I read when I was a school-boy, rises and exposes the criminality of his new associates, while still professing to belong to the party in power which has succeeded the Democratic party. Another distinguished Senator, who but very recently was baptized in this fountain of Republicanism, comes forth as its champion. Mr. President, with those kind feelings that I know exist personally between the honorable Senator and myself, I can only hope that, as Peter denied his Lord and Master, repented, and was forgiven, he is not too old yet, notwithstanding his political sins of the last few years, to repent of them and be forgiven also.

But the honorable Senator from Indiana raises a point of order; he asserts that it is not in order to hold an inquest over the dead body of the Democratic party when the coroner is not present. Sir, if the Democratic party is dead, what a gigantic corpse we have before us. One million seven hundred and fifty thousand voters in this country constitute that corpse, if corpse it be. Where is the living man that is to summon the coroner to hold an inquest over that dead body? By your own confession, and notwithstanding all the means to which you resorted, you had only some two hundred or two hundred and fifty thousand majority in the last presidential election; and I now say here, in the hearing of the country, that it is my solemn conviction that had that election been rightfully and legally determined, George B. McClellan, in favor of whose nomination I never was, would at this day be the declared President-elect of the United States.

Why do I say so? Why, sir, I, with other Democratic Senators, in compliance with the law of the land, in compliance with our duty, went over a few days ago to witness the most magnificent farce that I ever saw exhibited at the other end of the Capitol; and that was to hear the vote for President of the United States declared. I listened to it. It went on; and all the votes from the land of steady habits—and, with all respect for the honorable Senator who sits before me, [Mr. Wilson,] the land which not many years ago thought it pious to burn old women for witches, and which now thinks it equally pious to whitewash a negro and make him equal to a white man—were recorded for the present incumbent. It went on until it came to the gallant State represented by my friend from New Jersey, and then there was music in the sound. That vote gave out the true utterances of the voters of that State. Then came the vote of the smallest State now in the Union in population; and let me correct history for one moment. It has been said that Virginia is the mother of States; but, sir, I say then came the voice of the mother of States, the little State which I and my colleague represent on this floor; the State which was the first to adopt the Constitution, and which, by the action of her sons, has showed herself more faithful than any other so far heard from to the compact of the fathers, by being the first promptly to reject the unconstitutional proposed constitutional amendment. Then, I say, came the voice of that State, and though there were but three votes cast that sound brought joy to the ear and gladness to the heart.

Mr. President, I said that in my judgment had that vote been legally ascertained, George B. McClellan would have been declared to be the President of the United States. I was not in favor of his nomination; and foreseeing that he would be nominated, although a delegate to the convention, I would not attend, because he had identified himself with certain principles and had a record and a history which were antagonistic to the votes that I had given in this body, and I did not desire to condemn my own action by an indorsement of his record; and yet, when he was presented by that convention, welcoming any breeze that would bring happiness and prosperity, and in some measure restore constitutional liberty to this country, and get rid at once and forever of the mad counsels of the present incumbent of the executive chair and the party that now controls the destinies of this country, I supported him; and I repeat my belief that had that election been rightfully and legally determined he would have been declared the President-elect. Why do I say so? I have said that I was called upon to witness a farce in the counting of the votes in the House of Representatives. What were some of the evidences that it was a farce? I heard the State of Maryland announced as voting for Abraham Lincoln. A number of the counties of that State border on the county in which I live. I have traveled through them; and I have yet to find any evidence in favor of this Administration among that class of people with whom I became acquainted in that portion of the State. Will you tell me that Maryland voted at a free election for the present Executive of the United States when I know the fact that the armed military were at the polls; when I know that when, notwithstanding the unconstitutional act passed by a bogus Legislature and enforced by a bogus government in the State of Maryland, gentlemen against whose character not a word could be said, went forward and undertook to take the oath prescribed in that constitution, they were driven from the polls, and not allowed to vote?

Then came in Missouri, voting for Abraham Lincoln. Who believes that the people of Missouri, at a free election, would vote an indorsement of his policy? I do not refer to the young State called West Virginia. Her Senators know more of the sentiment of that portion of the State of Virginia than I do; but I have met representatives in the national council even from that portion of Virginia who have told me that if the opponents of the Administration had had any fair chance they could have carried that State.

Mr. WILLEY. The honorable Senator from Maryland—

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not belong to that province. Abraham has not got our State as a "province" exactly.

Mr. WILLEY. Well, sir, from the "province" of Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir; the "State" of Delaware.

Mr. WILLEY. Well, then, the State of Delaware; anything to satisfy the honorable Senator. I have the pleasure to inform the Senator, and I have no doubt it will be a pleasure to him to learn; that there was a regularly nominated ticket at the late presidential election in West Virginia of the party with which he is connected, and of which he feels so proud, a party adorned so highly on this floor; and in order to revive the Democratic party in our State they placed before the people five distinguished old-line Whigs and gave them the whole vote of the Democratic party in the young State of West Virginia; that there was a fair vote; and that they were beaten by more than three to one.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have witnessed in person some of these "fair elections" where there has been a regular Democratic ticket running. I recollect that only a year ago last fall the Democratic party in my State nominated a candidate for Congress, and the Republican party nominated their candidate. I recollect that election day came, and that handbills were thrown in the yards of farmers by armed soldiers passing by, cautioning them in reference to the approaching election. I recollect that they had squads of soldiers around the voting places, and that they had certain oaths stuck up, the paternity of which belongs to one renowned general, who is now a member of the other House, who has shed his blood upon many battle-fields, and illustrated the patriotism of his country not by accepting civil position in war, but by active campaigns in the field. He was once in command of the Middle department, and had his headquarters in Maryland, and I believe represents or misrepresents, in part, the State of Ohio. I recollect that notwithstanding there was a regular Democratic ticket in the field there were but fourteen Democratic votes cast; and why? We had the privilege of making a ticket; but we were notified beforehand of pains and penalties to be attached to voting in a particular way. I presume, therefore, when the Democrats of West Virginia had the privilege of making out a ticket they had some means of understanding that it was not exactly safe to exercise their right to vote according to their own judgment.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator's supposition is entirely unfounded. There were scarcely any troops in West Virginia, and no influence of the kind brought to bear upon the people. There never was a more free or fair election in any State in the Union.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand it all. On the occasion of the election in my State to which I refer I did not approach the polls. I thought I knew the terms upon which I could vote. I have no doubt there were Democrats in West Virginia just as intelligent, and who understood the whole matter just as well as I did.

I have made these remarks in response to the playful point of order raised by the honorable Senator from Indiana, to assure him that if this Administration had appointed a coroner to sit over the dead body of the Democratic party he would have found the largest corpse over which an inquest was ever held.

One remark more, sir, and I shall conclude. Let the Democrats of the country take heart. To them I say, though your enemies may charge you with being disloyal and in favor of disunion, with your glorious Union record, with the vast numbers who went to the polls, notwithstanding the arbitrary measures resorted to to deprive you of the exercise of the highest functions of the American citizen, when you see that you only fell some two hundred or two hundred and fifty thousand votes behind in a popular election in the States now in the Union and said to be loyal, the record is most encouraging; it gives hopes of the future. Forsake not your principles, but rally around the same old standard under which you were wont to fight. Remember that in all your history and throughout your entire administration of national affairs no citizen ever complained that he had been illegally arrested and placed in a Bastille. Remember that you have a record which shows that under your administration of the Federal Government no man was ever deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law. Recollect that throughout your entire history no press was forbidden to publish its views to the people of the country; that no executive hand was laid upon the freedom of the press. I say to the members of that glorious party, recollect that no President whom you ever elevated to that high position ever dared to claim the power of suspending the bulwark of liberty, the writ of habeas corpus, and then come before the Congress of the United States asking to be relieved from the consequences of the act. Recollect also that during the entire existence of your party, instead of dismemberment and disintegration, there was nothing but the addition of State after State. Contrast that with the record of this Republican party, and you have a platform of principles upon which you can safely go before the people of the country, if indeed Abraham the first Republican President is not to become Abraham the first emperor, and you may meet your political foes, and not by military force or a resort to unconstitutional means, but by the free exercise of that suffrage which is secured to you by the Constitution, Federal and State, achieve a noble triumph in the future.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I think, as this debate has assumed somewhat of a discursive character, it is perhaps a fitting occasion for Nevada to utter her first voice in this august presence.

I have been interested, instructed, amused, and pained by the discussions here to-day. Every Senator, of course, is the judge of his own taste; but if I had been the Senator from New Hampshire mine would not have led me in the direction in which his taste has led him here to-day. So, too, of the Senator from Delaware. He has attempted to enlighten and instruct us upon the history of the old, glorious Democratic party; and he remarked that he had never seen, in the course of his observation, a person who had formerly belonged to that party who would acknowledge that he left it. I desire to gratify him now by an exhibition of one who has the manliness to admit that he left the Democratic party when it had ceased to do good and had learned so well to do evil.

I do not think that the honorable Senator from Delaware has studied carefully the history of the Democratic party; his recollections of its glory rest in tradition. He intimates that he was one among the few that had stood here for years, like the stripling of Israel against the giant of Gath, to defend its principles. The misfortune of the gentleman is that most of his former associates are to be found in the rebel army; that they lost their love and their affection for the institutions of their country and have raised their arm to destroy it. In an evil hour, when passion instead of judgment controlled their action, they ceased to honor and respect the olden glory of their party, and have literally, in their madness, deluged this continent in blood.

The Senator closed his speech with a word of encouragement to his own party to stand firm and rally around their standard. And pray, sir, who was your last standard-bearer? A man of whom in the history of this country is written the fact that he was particeps criminis in this wicked rebellion—a fit candidate for a party whose first and whose last Vice President was a rebel.

Sir, the remarks of the Senator from Delaware—he will pardon me for saying it, (I believe in his heart he is loyal and right, but he lacks a little of that old Democratic firmness of which he boasts, to assert it)—sound like what I heard while sitting in this gallery about four years ago; and the Senator will remember it, as it was during the closing scenes of his party's existence. I allude to the remarks of Mr. Wigfall, Mr. Breckinridge, and a host of others whose names I will not mention, who seemed to me to have fallen into that great error into which no man, and especially no statesman, should fall, and to have reached that point where their adoration for party rose higher than their devotion and duty to their Government.

Sir, I have a right to remember the history of the old Democratic party. I acted with it before the Senator was old enough to vote; and one of two things is true, that the Democratic party departed from its original glory, fell, literally fell, from its high estate, or I did not understand its principles when I voted with it. I had always understood him to be the best Democrat who loved his country most, and who would make the greatest sacrifices to sustain it. That was the Democracy that was taught to me. But in modern times it seems to be the crowning glory of a Democrat to do the most to tear down the temple of republican freedom. With that kind of Democracy I have no sympathy, no affiliation. I love the Democratic party, if I love it at all, for its ancient glory and usefulness, not for its modern dereliction and recreancy.

We are told by the honorable Senator that during the Democratic reign the writ of habeas corpus was never suspended. Let me, to show his error, call the honorable Senator's attention to two or three instances. When the first Democratic Vice President of the United States was about to be arrested for treason, General Wilkinson was intrusted with the arrest; and the President at that time, a Democrat as he is claimed, suspended the writ of habeas corpus, and placed that suspension in the hands of the officer who was charged with the arrest ere he left this Capitol.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada will pause. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived the Senate will now take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

CLAIMS OF KANSAS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a little bill reported from the Committee on Claims, to which there will be no objection. It is Senate bill No. 70, to enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Kansas.

Mr. SHERMAN. The State of Kansas may have claims to the amount of several millions of dollars. I should like to know what the bill is going to appropriate before I consent to its being taken up.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I can explain it in a moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the bill can be reported that would be as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at large for the information of the Senate, and that will show what it is.

The Secretary read the bill, which proposes to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to receive satisfactory evidence, in lieu of the original vouchers, in support of a claim for expenses incurred by the State of Kansas, provision for reimbursement of which was made by the "Act to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States," approved July 27, 1861, the original vouchers having been destroyed by fire at the late massacre in Lawrence, Kansas.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims, with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That in the settlement of the above-mentioned claim there shall not be allowed to the State of Kansas a sum exceeding the sum of $12,351 04.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kansas in regard to the phraseology in this bill. As it now stands it would allow the Secretary of the Treasury to receive any description of evidence, no matter how weak, instead of confining himself to what would be in law secondary evidence. I will therefore move to strike out the word "satisfactory" and to insert the word "secondary," which has an exact, technical meaning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on the amendment of the committee. The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to amend the bill further by striking out the word "satisfactory" in the fourth line and inserting the word "secondary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 710) to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads to which land grants have been made in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (H. R. No. 735) in relation to marriages in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 166) to provide for mustering out of the military service certain non-commissioned officers and privates who enlisted to fill old regiments—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 167) for the relief of John Wells & Sons—to the Committee on Claims.

MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to make a report from a committee of conference, and as it is very brief I would be glad to have it acted upon now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the report, no objection being made. It will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, have met, and after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House concur in the first amendment of the Senate, with the following amendment: in line eleven strike out the word "volunteers," and in lieu thereof insert the words "volunteer or other forces."

That the House concur in the second amendment of the Senate, with the following amendments: strike out of the seventh line of said amendment the word "descend" and in lieu thereof insert the words "be paid;" and after the word "heirs" in the same line insert the words "or legal representatives."

That the conferees recommend that the Senate recede from its third amendment to said bill.

That the House concur in the amendment of the Senate to the title.

HENRY WILSON,
JAMES W. GRIMES,
HENRY S. LANE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JAMES F. WILSON,
E. R. ECKLEY,
W. H. WADSWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

REPUDIATION OF REBEL DEBT.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask the Senate to be good enough to take up the resolution which I introduced this morning. It is important that it should be acted on.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Whereas certain persons have put in circulation the report that on the suppression of the rebellion the rebel debt or loan may be recognized in whole or in part by the United States; and whereas such a report is calculated to give a false value to such rebel debt or loan: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That Congress hereby declares that the rebel debt or loan is simply an agency of the rebellion, which the United States can never, under any circumstances, recognize in any part or in any way.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons, shall pass, utter, publish, or sell, or attempt to pass, utter, publish, or sell, any note, token, device, scrip, bond, or other evidence of debt of the so-called confederate States, or any of them, issued since the 1st day of January, 1861, he or she shall be deemed or adjudged guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 and by imprisonment and confinement at hard labor not exceeding ten years, according to the aggravation of the offense.

Mr. SUMNER. I trust my colleague will not press that amendment on this resolution, which is only a concurrent resolution of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I thought it was a joint resolution, and therefore I desired to add this section which is contained in a bill that I have introduced here; but if it is only a resolution of the Senate I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I thought the hour of meeting this evening was half past seven o'clock, and I did not get in time to hear the resolution read. I ask therefore that it be read again.

The Secretary again read it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know what is the practice of the Senate or the House on a question of this kind; but judging from the reports of the proceedings of the two Houses, I take it it would be this: that no action of either body has ever been founded upon mere rumor, without some authentic source affording the basis for that action. This resolution says that whereas certain persons have reported so and so. Is it proper for the Senate of the United States, in a solemn resolution of the body, to take notice of some rumor upon the street, something that somebody has said on some occasion, there being no evidence before the body that any person in the world ever said it? Who is it, assuming to speak in behalf of the Congress of the United States and of the Government of the United States, that has put this report in circulation? I have never heard of it before. Who else has heard of it before? Where does it come from? To what and to whom does it owe its paternity? If it be true, as I have suggested, that before a solemn resolution of either branch of Congress be passed there must be some substantial basis for it, where is the evidence upon which this action now is sought to be founded? Who is it that has put this report in circulation? I have no doubt my friend, the colleague of the Senator that has offered it [Mr. WILSON] may know who they are. He must be familiar with all these things. If anybody has heard that report I have no doubt he has heard it, and I have no doubt having heard it he can give the authority for such a rumor as that. I should like to hear him give that authority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now call for the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill which was under consideration when it took a recess, being the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] upon which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NYE. At the time the recess was taken I was replying to the assertion of the honorable Senator from Delaware in regard to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, and had cited a well-known example of the exercise of the power to suspend it. Another illustrious man exercised that high prerogative, one whose Democracy even the honorable Senator from Delaware will not question. He found himself in New Orleans much in the position that some of our commanding generals have recently found themselves in other localities. He found there, at that early day, a modern Democrat, an editor of a paper, who published articles criticising the conduct of the commanding general when he was facing the army of the enemy. He thought that the public interests and the public safety required that both the paper and the editor should be arrested; and the historian has not recorded that there was any process by which that editor was arrested save the order, the mandate, of the commanding general. The editor was arrested, and there was then found by his side a judge of the modern Democratic school, ever ready to use this great writ of liberty when it is proposed to extricate or release one of his own belief; and Jackson thought that the public safety required that that judge too should be arrested. He was a Democrat with whom to think was to act, and he acted rightly and promptly, and caused the arrest. Sir, not exactly in this room, but in a room occupied by this honorable body, many years after, I heard the warmest, truest, highest eulogium passed upon the conduct of that brave man that ever fell from the lips of Democracy or from its opponents. This great nation through its representatives spoke approval of his conduct in language not to be misunderstood. They remitted the fine imposed upon the hero-patriot and soldier. The glory that Jackson achieved there was only eclipsed by the subsequent glory of putting down the attempted rebellion of which modern Democracy was the father and nullification the object.

Therefore, sir, I take it that the honorable Senator had forgotten these noble examples at the time he made the assertion that the writ of habeas corpus had never been suspended until this Administration came into power. He had forgotten that the press that was charged with mischief and malignity was stopped or "muzzled" by Andrew Jackson. He seemed to pass over all this with a view of getting at once to the alleged enormities of this Administration.

Mr. President, I have no defense to make for this Administration. It needs none at my hands. It is seen, it is written, it is printed, it is impressed upon every lineament of this country. Its glory shall live when its traducers shall have died. This Administration came into power at a moment when rebellion was commencing its mutterings, without an Army, with no Navy, or with what little we had scattered all over this continent. As the honorable Senator from Wisconsin has said, our Navy had to be gathered in from the remotest parts of the seas. Sir, it seems to me as though every Department of the Government on this occasion's demand had spoken, as if by magic, a power into existence that has been ample for the necessities of the times, wonderful in its creation, and yet more wonderful in its results.

Sir, this Administration has done more; and that, I take it, is the real cause of complaint, as well with the honorable Senator from Delaware as with those who think and act with him. It has produced a mighty moral and political revolution. Out of the fury that rebellion raised has issued glorious moral and political results. Sir, I am not one of those who call these the evil days of the history of our country. Far greater calamities may befall a nation than to be summoned to the fields of strife. Better that the land should be deluged with blood than that the spirit of liberty should be lost. Far better that every house should be draped in mourning than that republican freedom should be slain.

Sir, in the particular point about which I think the Senator from Delaware feels aggrieved is written the great glory of this Administration. It has spoken freedom to four million human beings that were in bondage. It has knocked the shackles from off the limbs of that number of slaves, and has given them freedom in their place. It has abolished those hateful words "master" and "slave," and they will be heard no more forever upon this continent. That is glory enough for one Administration, and reason enough, too, for those to complain of it who seem to have been chained a life-time to the car of slavery by links the world could not sever.

Does the Senator from Delaware wish to bring us back again into the cold embrace of modern Democracy? Sir, what have been its fruits? Look upon every battle-field from the Potomac to the Gulf, and you see there in long mounds of new-made graves the fruits of the teachings of modern Democracy. Look at the long rows of your hospital beds, and hear there a voice, which, if the heart is not adamant, will speak in terms to attract at least the attention of a modern Democrat.

Sir, I was willing to let this old Democratic party die, and I was willing that it should die and be buried without inquest. I believe it is a known principle of law that where the cause of death is positively known it is not necessary to call in a coroner. The Democratic party died of a disease of which the far-seeing or short-sighted might see it would die sooner or later. It died of what the eloquent Curran called "the doldrums"—a confusion of the head arising from the corruption of the heart. [Laughter.] The cause of death being well known, no coroner was called. It needed no verdict from a jury to advertise to the world the cause of the death of the Democratic party.

But, sir, I am frank to confess that the two Democratic Presidents who had suspended the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in former times differed materially from the character of Democrats in these days. They were Union men; they believed in upholding the pillars of our institutions, while modern Democracy seems to have taught the doctrine that our duty is to tear them down. This is the difference. The President, in times of revolution that have past, would have been held up to the scorn and derision of present and future generations if he had failed to do otherwise than suspend this writ.

Will the honorable Senator from Delaware tell you, sir, and this body, the exact condition in which the Democracy left the administration and the affairs of this Government? At the time the people rose in their majesty and wrested the scepter of power from the Democratic party the very atmosphere by which we were surrounded was thick with the fragments of dissolving empire. I have envied modern Democracy only in one thing, and that is, the perfect composure they exhibit while the evidences of portentous mischief to the country are all around them. They seem to fold their hands in meek submission to the grossest insults to which our country has been subjected. I know that it is not in the honorable Senator's heart to do this; but he is much in the position that many Democrats have been before. He lacks the courage, not physical, but moral, to break away from this corpse upon which he invokes an inquest. In olden times, as I have read, they had a strange punishment for the higher order of offenses. They chained the offender to a corpse, and made him drag it around till decay did its work and the body disappeared. I hope the honorable Senator from Delaware will soon cut the cord by which he is bound to that dead body, and let modern Democracy go where the verdict of the world has declared it ought to go, into utter oblivion.

Who would take us back again into the embrace of the last Democratic President, whose longer embrace would have been death? Where are now to be found the time-honored Democrats of whom the Senator speaks? Where is the president of the confederate States? Go ask him to-night what his politics are, and he will tell you he is a Democrat of the purest character. Go ask Toombs, and Hunter, and Mason, and Slidell, and Wigfall what their politics are, and they will chant you anthems to the glory of Democracy. Their Democracy has found its true status; it is arrayed with bloody steel against the glory and the integrity of this country. Thank God! there are thousands less of these Democrats now than there were when this rebellion broke out. Many of them have met their just deserts, and unless they speedily repent and submit themselves to the justice, the mercy, and the laws of their country, their numbers will be so diminished as not to cause any apprehension in regard to their future.

I find fault with modern Democrats for this: they seem to be willing and anxious to punish all crimes except the crime of treason. When one Department of our Government is arraigned before this body by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, the face of my distinguished friend from Delaware glows with unusual brightness, and he is anxious to join the honorable Senator from New Hampshire to punish frauds. O, the horror and the wickedness of these frauds! But the modern Democrats are not willing that the highest crime known to our law, treason, should be punished. Not a day passes by, not a paper that represents them do we read, but that is crying out for peace, honorable terms of peace, no terms that will look to subjugation, none that could mortify the pride of their brother Democrats; and now, when this great nation that has walked upright amid the scenes through which we have passed, which when the last star of hope grew pale, redoubled its courage, has beaten them upon every field, these modern Democrats want honorable peace and no penalties for treason inflicted! The law declares that if a man is guilty of larceny he shall be punished; if he is guilty of murder he shall be hanged; and the Constitution and the laws both declare that the penalty for treason is death; and yet there is not a modern Democrat that I have heard speak that does not want that penalty to be unenforced against those whose hands are red with the patriot blood of their fellow-countrymen.

Sir, I should not have occupied the attention of the Senate one moment on this question had I not come from a State just born into our glorious Union; a State the youngest in the sisterhood of States; a mountain State; and I rejoice that she proves the truth of the old saying that liberty is a mountain nymph. In our constitution we have put the negative upon all these modern Democratic pretensions of the rights of States when arrayed against the majesty of the Government. It is a State rich in mineral productions, but whose material wealth is poor when compared with the undying loyalty of her people. That new State, although the marks of her swaddling-clothes are yet around her, would rise up and condemn me should I sit here and listen to the invitations wooing us back into the embrace of this modern Democratic party; and above all would she arraign me before the bar of her judgment if I should silently suffer the Administration, that we have loved so well, to be defamed here in the house of its friends, and the imputations of its challengers listened to in silence.

I do not know but that there is something wrong in the Navy Department. The Senator from Wisconsin says there is not. The Senator from New Hampshire, who seems to have a special mission to perform with that Navy Department—for what reason I do not know—says there is. Sir, it would be strange, indeed, if there was not something wrong in all the Departments of this Government, hurried, as it was, from a quiet slumber of peace to the creation and command of the mightiest armies and navies of the world, which had to have their growth as rapid as the growth of the gourd in the night. It would be passing strange if there was not some corruption in these Departments. I have never believed that it made much difference with the purity of men to what particular party they belonged, or to what particular religious denomination. Men are but men; and sometimes they fall victims to their cupidity. I could cite many such instances in the Democratic period to my friend from Delaware that he would well remember; but yet the Democratic party did not make much noise about them. Unlike my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, they never told of them, if they knew of them; they kept the knowledge of them in their own breasts.

Mr. Fox may be wrong. If he is, put another man in his place. My friend from New Hampshire says that he has no doubt the Secretary of the Navy himself is an honest man. No one ever doubted that. In this connection the Senator from Delaware will pardon me if I remind him that the Secretary voted the Democratic ticket while the Senator's cheek was yet covered with the dew of youth, and learned, I grant, to be honest in the olden times of genuine Democracy, when the party as a whole were honest. Sir, when the history of these times shall be written it will stand out in bold relief, and form one of its brightest pages, that with the incalculable expenditure we have been called upon to make, very little of it has adhered to the palms of those who were charged with the duty of its disbursement.

The Senator from New Hampshire says that these iron-clads are failures. Sir, at least one of them was not a failure. If all the others should sink and find their harbor, as he suggests, in the bottom of the sea, that first-born Monitor has written a history of glory for this country that will never die. It defeated with a single shot the monster creation of the rebellion, and drove her back crippled and wounded to her hiding-place, from which she never again emerged, but found her destiny deep buried in the fathomless ocean sands. If the rest are all failures that is enough. But, sir, they are not failures; there is much less of failure about them than might reasonably have been expected in these wonderful naval creations—creations that to-day make old England sing in a whisper she is the mistress of the seas; a Navy that keeps the imperial ruler of France from sending his army and navy to find harbors and gold and silver upon our western shores.

I thought it unwise in the Senator from New Hampshire to advertise these iron-clads as failures; but after all I do not know that it was. Let those who desire to invade our rights try it, and these much-abused vessels will not only vindicate themselves, but put to flight the invader. This Navy that was created so magically attracts the attention of the whole world; and while Great Britain and France have been anxious to write on parchment the acknowledgment of the independence of the southern democratic confederacy they saw the fifteen-inch muzzles of our iron-clads, well loaded, and hesitated; and our Navy made them hesitate.

I hope, Mr. President, that all the appropriations that are needed to perfect this Navy will be freely voted by this body. I desire to see it of sufficient magnitude to be a standing advertisement to the world that we are not only able to put down rebellion at home, but are able to resist invasion from without.

Sir, it is too late in the day to talk of economizing. This modern Democratic party that led us up to the shambles have put it out of our power to economize. Two things are certain: this rebellion must be put down; it will be put down; and another thing is just as certain, that when it is put down the nations of the earth will have notice that we are prepared to defend ourselves against the open as well as the covert attacks of an opposing world.

I hope, sir, that all the appropriations that this careful, scrutinizing committee calls for will be voted by the Senate. I know the care with which the chairman of this committee investigates and reports, and upon his suggestion that certain appropriations are necessary, Nevada—I think I can speak for my colleague—will give two votes without any reference to the magnitude of what is required. Yonder mountains are full of the material with which to pay the national obligation. Providence has kindly stored away in the lofty mountains of Nevada, and Idaho, and Oregon, treasure enough to make the debt which we now owe, or may owe at the conclusion of this bloody war, dwindle and dwarf into insignificance. Open up to us a way by which we can get the means of producing it, and we can as well give you $500,000,000 a year as the $30,000,000 that we annually send you now. Sir, I know of no debt that is too mighty for a nation to incur to save its freedom. I know of no debt that should stand between us and the putting down of this rebellion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Nothing but a sincere desire to hear the concluding remarks of the honorable Senator from Nevada could have induced me to come here this evening. I am not in favor of evening sessions, and do not intend under any circumstances to attend them unless there is some important question to be decided, or where some remarks have been made before the recess in the afternoon which shall require my presence.

The honorable Senator from Nevada, in the opening of his remarks, was kind enough to make some personal allusions to myself. While giving me credit personally for loyalty he suggested that the sound of my voice reminded him of the utterances of former days from Wigfall and others. Let me tell that Senator, if he had read aright the history of those days he would have found that when on the first day the last annual message of President Buchanan came into this Chamber, and Mr. Iverson and Mr. Wigfall occupied the whole day in proclaiming the doctrine of secession, when no Senator on that side of the Chamber rose to utter one word of protest, it was the Senator from Delaware, who, as a motion was made to adjourn, rose in his place and asked for five minutes of the time of the Senate, and then and there declared that his State, having been the first to enter the Federal Union, would under any and all circumstances be the last to abandon it. So much for the similarity of the sound of the voice of Mr. Wigfall and the Senator from Delaware.

It must have been amusing to you, Senators, who all your life-time have been opposing the Democratic party, to hear the confessions and the experiences of the new converts to your faith made in the Senate Chamber this afternoon and this evening. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire introduced the class-meeting and the love-feast, and you, old opponents of the Democracy, have stood by quietly. I suppose the meeting was an open one, and the exercises commenced for the special purpose of letting new converts give in their experience, confess their errors, and to avow perpetual cordiality of sentiment between you and them in the future. The Senator who opened it was himself an old political sinner according to your modern notions. My honorable friend from Wisconsin who followed has not been very long in a state of grace; and now comes the new and eloquent Senator from Nevada, whose utterances I read when I was a school-boy in behalf of this old sinning and sinful Democratic party—

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. My answer is that when I was a child I thought as a child. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, there is a second childhood. We have our first; we have our manhood; and what do you think of the stage of second childhood into which the Senator has passed?

The new converts have given in their experience; but I have heard nothing drop from their lips to contradict this proposition which I intend to submit: notwithstanding all the sins of the Democratic party, notwithstanding their attachment to slavery, if attachment it be—I should rather say, notwithstanding their devotion to the Constitution of their country—all these gentlemen who have spoken remained with it, indorsed it, and occupied the chief places in its political synagogue until very recently. I think that you, Senators, old opponents of the Democracy, have shown very kindly feelings in allowing the young converts on this occasion to give in their political experience. You remember the admonition of Scripture, "Carry the lambs in your bosom." You are taking care of the lambs of the flock.

But the honorable Senator proposes to inform me correctly in reference to the history of my Government. He volunteers to show me from authentic record two instances in which the writ of habeas corpus has been suspended by Democratic Administrations; and what is the first? He tells us that when the first Democratic Vice President of the United States committed treason, the writ was suspended by Jefferson. There was something in the tone of the honorable Senator in referring to Aaron Burr as having been the first Democratic Vice President that would suggest to the mind of a casual listener that the honorable Senator was so shocked that he never could have belonged to or had connection with a party whose first Vice President was a traitor; and yet, notwithstanding the treason of Aaron Burr, the honorable Senator was a most devout worshiper at the Democratic shrine.

But was the honorable Senator correct in his historical reference? I ask you, sir, to notice the difference in the view taken by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Nevada, these two new converts to Republican faith, and old Democratic sinners—without any personal disrespect, however, to either. See how they differ. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin denies that Jefferson was a Democrat. The honorable Senator from Nevada, to give a thrust at the Democratic party, quotes him as a Democrat, and says that he suspended the writ of habeas corpus, and therefore the suspension has Democratic warrant. Sir, Thomas Jefferson never did any such thing. Here is the record. I have had occasion before to discuss that question in the Senate of the United States, and I now refer to it as taken from the Annals of Congress, which I presume the young Republican from Nevada has not yet consulted, having taken it upon faith when he was a Democrat. Here it is, sir. Let us see whether Thomas Jefferson ever assumed to do any such thing. I quote from remarks heretofore made by me in the Senate of the United States upon the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus:

"The first occasion for the practical consideration of the question arose in 1807, and grew out of the alleged conspiracy of Aaron Burr. Thomas Jefferson was President, and James Madison, who had much to do with the framing of that instrument, and who is universally admitted to have had as correct a knowledge of its provisions as any man of his day, was his Secretary of State. Three men, Bollman, Swartwout, and Ogden, were arrested at New Orleans, on affidavits charging them with treason, made by Generals Wilkinson, Eaton, and others; and the two former were sent to the District of Columbia, and thereupon—"

Mark you, it was no act of Thomas Jefferson, no act of a Democratic Administration, but the act of military officers assuming to act independently of law—

"and thereupon, on the 26th of January, 1807, Mr. Jefferson sent to the Senate and House of Representatives the following message:—"

I will quote it in full, so that the new Republican from Nevada and the old Democrat from New York may have the benefit of the message, to see what is the truth of the record:

"I received from General Wilkinson, on the 23d instant, his affidavit, charging Samuel Swartwout, Peter V. Ogden, and James Alexander with the crimes described in the affidavit, a copy of which is now communicated to both Houses of Congress. It was announced to me at the same time that Swartwout and Bollman, two of the persons apprehended by him, were arrived in the city in custody each of a military officer."

That was the first thing Mr. Jefferson knew about it.

"I immediately delivered to the attorney of the United States in this District the evidence received against them, with instructions to lay the same before the judges."

Not before a military commission, not before a court-martial, as this modern Democratic patriot, Edwin M. Stanton, is in the habit of doing, whose record I propose to give in evidence, before I shall have concluded, upon this very subject of loyalty; for I find that the most loyal men now in the country are backsliders from the Democratic faith, from the principles the Democratic party has held from the beginning, and from the great doctrines of State rights which I was taught to believe were true in my infancy, which I believed in my ripening manhood, and which the future experience of this country will prove are true.

"I immediately delivered to the attorney of the United States in this District the evidence received against them, with instructions to lay the same before the judges, and apply for their process to bring the accused to justice, and put into his hands orders to the officers having them in custody to deliver them?"

To whom?

"to the marshal on his application."

What kind of a marshal? A provost marshal? No sir; the civil officer, the marshal of this District. There is the record of how Thomas Jefferson and Mr. Madison acted. Sir, they were giants, and could tread majestically on Alpine heights and be recognized as giants still. To compare them with the men of the present day would be to compare giants with pigmies, who though perched on Alps are pigmies still.

Such is the history of that case. What is it in reference to General Jackson? General Jackson's action was not in accordance with the action nowadays. New Orleans was his camp. A judge was in his camp; and I believe it is admitted by most men, although I do not know exactly whether it ought to have been admitted, that within the military lines the will of the commanding officer is the law. But, sir, does that precedent support the position which the honorable Senator has assumed? Not so. When the immediate danger in that case passed process was issued against the commanding general of that department, Andrew Jackson. What did he do? Did he do as your officials do now, set at defiance the mandates of the courts and say, "We strut the stage a brief hour with military authority, and we will not heed the commands of a judicial tribunal?" No, sir; the man whose whole life had been devoted to his country walked into the court-house, obeyed the process, heard the sentence imposed, and paid the fine in obedience to law, and, though a grateful country afterward, in consideration of the valuable services he had rendered, refunded that fine, it was no judgment of the country that the act was in compliance with law.

But the honorable Senator from Nevada speaks of modern Democrats, and he seems rather indignant that the history of the Democratic party should be put in opposition to the history of the Republican party. Sir, what history have you? He talks of his State of Nevada in her swaddling-clothes. Before your party was in its swaddling-clothes your country became great, powerful, and mighty among the nations of the earth through the action of the Democratic party. What record have you? What great principle in legislation having reference to the interests of the white race have you ever inaugurated? What word in behalf of that race has your party ever uttered? Your record, as far as utterances go, is simply that of sympathy, and, I must say from your legislation, affiliation with the negro race at the expense of the race to which you belong. For the first time since God made man and since the organization of human government we behold the example of a proud, gallant, superior race bending their energies to degrade themselves down to the level of an inferior race. Thank God! the proud mission of the Democratic party has ever been to develop the godlike elements of the white man.

Another charge brought by the honorable Senator against the old party at whose breast he first drew the milk of life was that it was in favor of peace. It has become treasonable nowadays to be in favor of peace. Whence the origin of your doctrine, and whence the origin of ours? Peace descends from heaven; war springs from hell. At midnight, on old Judea's plains, the peaceful shepherds watched their flocks by night, when, lo! the angelic messengers of heavenly mercy thronged the air and swept the land, proclaiming "Peace on earth." The heralding of a Saviour's birth was followed by a life devoted to the inculcation of the duty and principle of peace. His salutation upon every humble dwelling was "Peace be with you;" his farewell on his departure thence was "Peace I leave you." When Heaven's inspired prophet would foretell the coming of the world's Redeemer, even Omniscience itself knew no higher name to bestow than that of the "Prince of Peace." Hear Isaiah: "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace." When Israel's bard would tune his harp to noblest song, he sings not of war or discord or strife, but he sings the song of peace: "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." And oh! ye assumers of modern wisdom, hear what the wisest of his race, Solomon, said when speaking of the ways of wisdom: "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." And when you talk of national greatness, glory, and renown, and of the great blessings that are to come from a people at war, hear what the I Am, the Jehovah, said to the chosen people of Israel. What did He promise them? The development of rich mines in mountain districts, extended country, vast empire? No; but "Peace shall be within thy borders." And yet, sir, what prophets foretold, what inspired poets sang, what a world's Redeemer practiced and inculcated, and what the eternal God promises as the greatest blessing to man, is evidence of disloyalty!

Mr. President, instead of charging upon the good, great, and glorious Democratic party, which is in favor of peace, disloyalty and treason, let those who so charge go and consult their own voices, and review the action of their own party, and join with me in the invocation against the traitor—their own principles and their own party—that has brought this upon the country:

"Oh! for a tongue to curse the slave
Whose treason, like a deadly blight,
Comes o'er the counsels of the brave,
And blasts them in their hour of night."

As yours did when we, the friends of peace, were advising conciliation and compromise:

"May life's unblest cup for him
Be dregged with treachery to the brim,
With hopes that but allure to fly,
With joys that vanish while he sips,
Like Dead-sea fruits, that tempt the eye,
But turn to ashes on his lips.
His country's curse, his children's shame,
Outcast of virtue, peace, and fame,
May he at last, with lips of flame,
On the parched desert thirsting lie,
While lakes that shone in mockery nigh
Are passing off untouched, untasted,
Like the once glorious hopes he blasted.
And when from earth his spirit flies,
Just Prophet! let the damned one dwell
Full in the sight of Paradise,
Beholding heaven and feeling hell."

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I would, if I could, bring the Senate back to the consideration of the subject immediately before it. I shall attempt to do so in the few remarks I have to submit this evening.

I shall not follow gentlemen in the wandering debate that has characterized this occasion. I shall discuss no party issues. I have no encouragements to pronounce upon and no denunciations to utter against the old Democratic and Whig parties, for I am content that the dead should bury their dead.

I shall say nothing of the alleged corruptions in the Navy Department, for all these charges have been triumphantly refuted by the Senator from Wisconsin, who was a member of the select committee of this body specially instructed to investigate them.

I have nothing to say of the attempted purchase of a part of Seavey's Island for the use of the Portsmouth navy-yard, for it is in the recollection of most of the Senators here that all the remarks that have been submitted to the Senate to-day upon that subject have been annually replied to by the distinguished gentleman now at the head of the Treasury Department, very much to the satisfaction of the Senate. I cannot help, however, remarking in this connection that all the wrong in that case, if there were any wrong, was done by a rear admiral of the Navy, an officer of the very class whom it is sought by the amendment under consideration to make omnipotent on this subject as well as upon every other connected with naval affairs. Nor have I any reply to make in relation to the contemplated purchase of land for additions to the navy-yard at Charlestown, except to state the significant fact that that purchase also was recommended by the officers attached to that yard—the same class of men, be it remembered, who will be made Lords of the Admiralty should the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio be adopted.

Mr. President, I suppose this question will be decided—it certainly ought to be—without any regard to personal considerations. We ought to approach this question without being influenced in the remotest degree by our likes or our dislikes of any individual now connected, or who has hitherto been connected, or is likely to be connected, with the administration of the Navy Department. We are not legislating in regard to any individual. There may be an objectionable man connected with the Navy as Assistant Secretary, or as Secretary, or as head of a bureau. Our remedy in such a case is to get rid of that man, and not by one swoop, upon an appropriation bill, attempt to overturn the entire naval organization.

I do not stand here to-night as the defender or as the advocate of any man, but to maintain what I believe to be the public interest in connection with the Navy Department. It is the public service we are to promote, and not the interests of any man or set of men. I shall not seek to defend or palliate any wrong, no matter by whom committed. I believe that this Department, as all other Departments, has made mistakes, but the true remedy for them is not the one set forth by the Senator from Ohio; and entertaining the opinions that I do on the subject, there is no alternative for me but to oppose as strenuously as I may be able the amendment that he proposes.

I have no fault to find with the Senator from Ohio for proposing this amendment. It is true that we have a Naval Committee, of which I happen to be a member. It is true that it is the business of that committee to examine into all the laws in connection with naval affairs, to inform themselves of the operations of the naval organization, to understand not only its written but its unwritten laws, to know what vessels have been built or are being built, the character of their armament, the character of the machinery by which they are to be propelled, their efficiency and speed, and the character of the contracts under which they are to be built. I think I can say that the Committee on Naval Affairs have endeavored, as far as their capacity and time would allow them, to thus inform themselves on all these points. It is the duty also of this committee to inform themselves, and I think they have attempted to do it, not only in regard to our own particular naval organization, but in regard to the naval organizations of the different nations of the earth, and if in their opinion there be any advantages over ours in any of those organizations to suggest them to the Senate for adoption into our own. I think the Committee of the Senate on Naval Affairs have informed themselves in regard to each of the many descriptions of vessels, some twenty-five or thirty, that have been built by the Navy Department, and that now constitute parts of our Navy.

Nor am I going to find fault with the Senator because in obedience to an instruction which he received from the Senate, as a member of the committee on the conduct of the war, he examined only one particular type of vessels that had been built by the Department, and found some objections to that class. But I submit to the Senate that it would hardly be wise for them in a time like this, upon a supply bill, because there happened to be in the estimation of the committee on the conduct of the war some objections to that particular kind of vessels, to overturn the entire Navy organization, when the Naval Committee, who have examined into ALL the various descriptions of vessels that have been built, and have been able to survey the whole field, and having done it in obedience to the general instructions which they have received from this body, have not deemed it advisable to propose any such change.

Nor am I going to object that this amendment was studiously kept secret—I will not say that; but that it was not communicated to the Senate or to the Naval Committee before it was offered. It is possible that we might have taken a different view of the subject if our attention had been called to it earlier, if we had been permitted to pass upon it and investigate it as an independent measure by itself; but coming to us as it does, and informed as we are in regard to the general operations of the Navy, knowing the success that it is admitted on all hands has been achieved by the Department in the construction of the varied descriptions of vessels; knowing what has been accomplished for the country and for our national reputation by the Navy during the last four years under its present administration, we have unhesitatingly come to the conclusion, as the organ of this body in connection with naval affairs, that this change ought not to be made, and would prove to be most disastrous if made.

The whole argument upon which this amendment is based proceeds upon one assumption, and that is that there have been mistakes made in the construction of what are known as the light-draught iron-clads. Admit it. Is that a reason for overturning the Navy Department? Is this the first mistake that has been made? If the committee on the conduct of the war had inquired of the Naval Committee, we could have told them that a similar mistake was made in regard to the second class of monitors that were built, that same class of monitors which have been doing such efficient service at Fort Fisher, and of which Admiral Porter speaks in such eulogistic terms. Is it unknown to the committee on the conduct of the war that at least one half of all the old sailing vessels that have been built since the establishment of the American Navy have been modified and changed? Does not the Senator know as well as I do that within five years the Pensacola was changed under our own eyes at the navy-yard in Washington, and forty feet added to her length? Was that a reason for overturning the Navy Department? Does not the Senator know—if he had informed himself he might have known—that nearly all of the British iron-clad vessels, such as the Warrior and Black Prince, are now pronounced failures? Does any man doubt it? I have the highest British authority for saying it lying upon my desk to be read if desired; and the Warrior is now being dismantled, being considered unfit to go to sea.

Did the Senator ever know that a peer of the realm or any member of the House of Commons rose in his place in the British Parliament and gravely proposed to overturn the whole Admiralty system of that empire upon a supply bill because mistakes had been made in the construction of their iron-clad vessels—vessels that have cost millions of pounds sterling? What would be thought of such a proceeding were it attempted?

Admit the mistake to be as great as it is charged to be. Is this the only mistake that has been made? Has no other Department blundered? Have there been no mistakes in the Treasury, and will you put that Department in commission also? Has the War Department been entirely free from blunders during the last four years, and if not, will you overturn that Department upon an amendment to the Army appropriation bill?

But how great is this alleged mistake, where did it originate, and how is it to be obviated by the Senator's amendment? If I understood the Senator correctly, he entirely exonerated the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy from all blame in this matter.

Mr. WADE. Perhaps that statement is a little too broad. I certainly did not accuse them of any intentional wrong, but there were sins of omission perhaps that will be found when we come to report the evidence. The statement of the Senator is a little broader than the one I intended to make.

Mr. GRIMES. I understood the Senator to say so. Perhaps I misunderstood what he said. Mr. WADE. I did not exactly mean that.

Mr. GRIMES. If I remember aright, the charge of malfeasance, or misfeasance, or non-feasance, whatever it was that the Senator brought, was against the chief of the Bureau of Construction principally, or perhaps against a board of which he spoke, and of which the chief of the Bureau of Construction and the chief of the Bureau of Engineering were members.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that I complained of a general looseness and inattention to the business. It does not seem to have been anybody's business to attend particularly to the construction of these vessels. They were passed from hand to hand, and frequently the person engaged and charged with it, Mr. Stimers, was sent on other duty, and so it would pass into other hands. There was a general inattention; it was nobody's business really to trace the matter through. That is what I charged. That was the principal complaint I made.

Mr. GRIMES. I think I did not misunderstand the Senator when he said that the charge was based principally upon the testimony of Mr. Stimers, which was given two or three days before he made his speech here yesterday, and which yet remains untranscribed in the notes of the reporter, and that Mr. Stimers said he had applied to Mr. Lenthall, or Mr. Isherwood, or to a board of which they were members, to compute the displacement of those vessels, and that they refused to do it.

Mr. WADE. They did not do it.

Mr. GRIMES. I was at once satisfied that there was some mistake about that statement of the Senator. I was satisfied that the Senator from Ohio was misinformed, and that his criticisms upon the chief of the Bureau of Construction were unjust. It is a singular fact that the gentlemen who advocated and opposed this amendment in the House of Representatives united in one thing, and I believe only in one thing, and that was in the encomiums pronounced on the chief of the Bureau of Construction; while the advocates of the same measure in the Senate also unite in one thing, and perhaps only in one thing, and that is in their condemnations of the chief of the Bureau of Construction. After I listened to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio I had a conversation with him on the subject, and discovered that I did not misunderstand the statements of his speech in this regard. I then addressed a note to the chief of the Bureau of Construction, satisfied as I was that the Senator was wholly mistaken, first as to Mr. Lenthall having had any connection with the light-draught iron-clads, and second, as to his being opposed to the construction of iron vessels, for I think the Senator made that charge also. I have a letter from the chief of the bureau, written this morning, which I will read. It is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR,
February 17, 1865.

Sir: In reply to your inquiry of this date, I have respectfully to say that I was never a member of any board to which the subject of the light-draught monitors was referred. I have no knowledge that any such board was ever called; nor was I ever asked to calculate their displacement, and therefore did not refuse to do so. To this day I have never seen any of the plans or specifications of these vessels or of their machinery, except the general outline of the hulls deposited in this bureau by Chief Engineer Stimers at the time the advertisement to contractors referring them to Chief Engineer Stimers's office at New York was issued inviting propositions from bidders.

It is not true that I am now or that I ever have been opposed to the building of iron-clad vessels, or so intimated to any one. But, on the contrary, I have strongly advocated vessels of that class. I have views of my own as to the adaptation of certain classes of these vessels for sea-going purposes; but I have never doubted the value or necessity of the monitor type for the purposes of harbor defense, and the unsatisfactory result of the light-draught monitors is altogether due to errors of detail made by Chief Engineer Stimers, and not to the general principle of these vessels.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN LENTHALL, Chief of Bureau.
Hon. JAMES W. GRIMES, Chairman of Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. Lenthall is one of the most competent and one of the purest men, in my estimation, notwithstanding what has been said by Senators on this floor, that I have ever had the fortune to be acquainted with—a gentleman of whom an eminent officer of the Navy, speaking of his merits, said that if he had lived under any other Government he would long since have been knighted for the services he had rendered his country.

Now, I think, Mr. President, it will be admitted even by the Senator himself, that the whole substructure of his argument is removed. He based his argument entirely upon the testimony of Stimers—Stimers, who made the mistake in the calculation of displacement, and who was therefore directly interested in swearing, as he did swear, according to the Senator's version of his testimony, that the blame rested, not upon himself, but on some one else. He must fix it upon some one, so a mythical board that never had any existence, but which was said to be composed in part of two persons toward whom he does not entertain very friendly feelings, was selected as the scape-goat to bear the burden of his sins.

The Senator will remember that yesterday he was not able to tell me who was the third member of this apocryphal board of officers. He said that Stimers stated that it was composed of Lenthall and Isherwood, and some one else whose name he could not recollect, and who, it seems, is destined to be unknown in history. I cannot secure the testimony of this unknown man, but I have the testimony of Mr. Isherwood on this subject, which I will read:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING, Feb. 17, 1865.

Sir: In reply to your note of inquiry concerning certain facts in relation to the light-draught monitors, I have to say that I never was a member of any board to consider or pass on that subject, that no such board was ever, to my knowledge, called, nor was my opinion on the subject ever asked of me further than to estimate (after the designs had been adopted) what speed a certain boiler-power would give a certain immersed amidships-section assumed at a draught of six feet.

I never saw either the plans or specifications of these vessels, or of their machinery; never gave any directions in regard to them; and did not have in any way the slightest connection with their design or construction.

I have always been strongly in favor of building iron-clad war steamers of the type and proportions which my professional experience could approve.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. F. ISHERWOOD.

Hon. J. W. GRIMES, United States Senator.

So much for the testimony of Stimers before the committee on the conduct of the war, and the mythical board of construction or computation that has been so thoroughly denounced as old and incapable. Can there be a lingering doubt in the mind of any one as to the weight that should be given to Stimers's testimony in this matter? If such a board ever existed the record of its creation is in the Navy Department. Where is that record? It has no existence.

Now, Mr. President, I repeat the inquiry, how much of a mistake has been made, after all? I think not a great one; I think that the Government has not been greatly injured. If I am not mistaken the Senator stated that these vessels had been raised so as to give them a larger draught than was at first intended, and, if I did not misconceive what he stated, he said, in answer to a question of a Senator on the other side of him, that they were raised with wood. Am I right?

Mr. WADE. I said they were continued up twenty-two inches.

Mr. GRIMES. Of wood?

Mr. WADE. Yes; of wood and iron—iron-clad as the rest of it was.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator is mistaken in regard to that. They are iron, and not wood, as I understood the Senator yesterday.

Mr. WADE. Wood faced with iron.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator is mistaken. They are wholly of iron. Well, Mr. President, how great are the mistakes that have thus been made? How much is the Government going to be injured? On this subject I beg leave to read a letter addressed to the Senator from Ohio himself by the Secretary of the Navy, and which will doubtless considerably enlighten the Senate on this subject. Every Senator who has engaged in this discussion has asserted his belief that the Secretary of the Navy is a strictly honest man. He would not seek to mislead us or the country. What are his opinions on this subject, founded upon research and information far more thorough and extensive than it was possible for the Senator from Ohio to make? I will read:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 16, 1865.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th ultimo, inclosing a copy of a resolution of the Senate in the following words:

"Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to inquire what progress has been made in the construction of the iron-clad gunboats contracted for in the year 1862—by whom the contract was made on the part of the Government—who planned the models of the same, and who is responsible therefor? Have any of them been finished? If so, what was the condition of the vessel after she was launched? Are the other vessels contracted for to be built on a plan or model similar to the Chimo lately launched at Boston? and all information which may be had touching said gunboats."

I am requested in the letter transmitting a copy of the resolution to "furnish the committee, as soon as convenient, with such information upon the subject-matter of the resolution as may be in possession of the Navy Department."

I presume that a mistake has been made by the committee or by the Senate in their inquiry relative to the "iron-clad gunboats contracted for in the year 1862." In the spring and summer of 1863 contracts were made for twenty turreted vessels of the Monitor class. Not doubting that the resolution of the Senate and the investigations and inquiries of the committee have reference to those contracts and those vessels, my response will be made as if the resolution read 1863 instead of 1862. The mistake of a year in regard to the execution of these contracts, provided they are, as I suppose, those referred to, is important to the contractors as well as to the Department, and should therefore be corrected.

In answer to that part of the resolution which inquires "by whom the contract was made on the part of the Government," I have to state it was by the Chief of the Bureau of Construction under advertisement issued by this Department, on the 10th of February, 1863. A reference to the message of the President and accompanying documents of the first session of the present Congress may be had for a list of bidders and award of contracts under direction of this Department.

It is asked "who planned the models of the same, and who is responsible therefor?"

The general idea of a light-draught iron-clad inside of a raft of wood was furnished by Captain John Ericsson, of New York, the distinguished inventor, at the request of this Department. The details of the plan and the preparation of the working drawings were intrusted to Chief Engineer A. C. Stimers, who was instructed by the Bureau of Construction to consult with Captain Ericsson and take directions from him.

It will be observed that this relates to all the monitors.

Mr. WADE. The twenty light-draught monitors?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, all of them.

To that extent Chief Engineer Stimers is responsible.

"Have any of them been finished, if so, what was the condition of the vessel after she was launched?"

None of the light-draught turreted vessels are quite finished. The Casco, converted into a boat for reconnoitering and torpedo purposes has recently made a passage from Boston to New York. Complaints were made by the officers of discomforts, as complaints were formerly made by the brigs and schooners of the Navy, so many of which, like the Grampus, Somers, Porpoise, and Bainbridge, have gone to sea and never been heard of.

The Secretary might have added the Levant and several others.

The Chimo was the first of her class which was got into the water, and led to the discovery that due allowance had not been made for all the weights. She floated on an even keel only about three inches above the water, instead of fifteen, as was intended and expected. Several of the same class which have been since launched have varied considerably from this, all of them being high out of the water, notwithstanding all were made from the same drawings, showing that there have been variations in model or in the weight of materials used in construction.

Before any of this class of vessels had been launched, Rear Admiral Dahlgren and Acting Rear Admiral Lee had strenuously urged the Department to send them some monitors—hulls without turrets—to be used for the purpose of reconnaissance and as torpedo-boats. Five of the light-draughts most advanced were therefore ordered to be finished without the turrets. When relieved of this weight, the necessity and expense of raising their sides and thereby increasing their capacity was obliterated. The other fifteen were recommended to be enlarged by building them higher, thus increasing their capacity about one hundred and thirty tons, and rendering them consequently more efficient. Previously the same plan was adopted in constructing and completing the second batch of monitor vessels, which have just passed through the baptism of fire at Fort Fisher, and have remained at anchor on that coast, exposed as it is in the winter season ninety miles from a harbor, during the most terrific gale of wind ever experienced, according to the Wilmington papers, and performing, as Rear Admiral Porter reports, to the admiration of everybody.

"Are the other vessels contracted for to be built on a plan or model similar to the Chimo, lately launched at Boston?"

I have already stated that twenty light-draught monitors were contracted for in the spring and summer of 1863. All were designed upon the monitor plan which has been so serviceable, but modifications and alterations were made of five, omitting the turrets for special purposes, by special request of naval officers.

The resolution, in conclusion, calls for "all information which may be had touching said gunboats."

The necessity of light-draught iron-clads to operate in the bays, sounds, and rivers, as well as for defensive purposes, was forced upon the Department at an early period of the present struggle. Not only was the contest in which we were engaged peculiar, but the means and measures to meet and suppress it, particularly those of the Navy, were novel and without precedent. Most of the lines of Army communication were by water, and the Navy was expected to protect them and render them secure. A brief experience and a few engagements made it evident that light-draught, unprotected, wooden boats, with magazines, machinery, and boilers exposed, could be driven off by field artillery behind earthworks. Light-draught iron-clads became, therefore, an imperative necessity, and the convictions of the Department, and of all indeed who gave the subject intelligent consideration, were irresistibly in favor of such vessels; but we were without models, and the wants of the country were pressing. Neither of the maritime Powers of Europe had built, or attempted to build, a light-draught iron-clad.

The Navy Department, in this emergency, was compelled to feel its way, without experience or precedent in any quarter to guide it. Appeals had been made in vain to Congress to provide a proper establishment for the construction of iron and armored vessels, where plans and models might have been developed and matured with studied deliberation and skill. When the contracts for these vessels were entered into, delays were inadmissible. Difficulties with foreign Powers seemed imminent, and in

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 55.

the absence of any national establishment immediate contracts for the construction of armored vessels were called for on every hand. The authorities of the States and cities on the seaboard were appealing to the Department and the Government for iron-clad vessels to defend their harbors from the two or three rovers that were then already abroad, and great apprehensions were entertained that certain formidable ships in the process of construction in France and England for the rebels would soon visit our coast. Many who may now be forward to criticize and censure the enlarged and energetic action that was taken were at that time profuse in censure of the Department for delays in not more promptly providing whatever vessels were necessary for the service.

Congress having omitted to provide an establishment for the construction of an iron navy, where this class of armored vessels of light draught could be constructed, the Department has been compelled to rely on contractors and outside parties in different sections of the country for the work.

The parties contracting have generally exerted themselves to meet in good faith the requirements of the Government, and it is a subject of just congratulation that, in this great emergency, when the Department was compelled to act without precedent to guide it, and when the Government had omitted to furnish a suitable establishment, private enterprise and our skilled mechanics have so well met the difficulties presented.

Mr. J. B. Eades, of St. Louis, furnished the light-draught river boats which have been so successful on the Mississippi and also in the bay of Mobile. Captain Ericsson, the inventor of the monitor class of vessels, furnished the idea which is now near practical consummation. Although as yet untried these vessels differ so little from the original monitor that there is every reason to anticipate their success. To predict otherwise would be presumption; yet it has been the misfortune of the Department to encounter hostility and forebodings of failure with every improvement which has been made during the war, and often from those of whom encouragement and support might reasonably have been expected. Some of the best engineers and constructors in the service of the Government, as well as others, expressed their want of confidence in the first monitor and declared it would prove a failure. It was represented that she could not float, that she would plunge to the bottom when launched, and that to send her to Hampton Roads would be recklessness amounting to crime. A constant succession of struggles against prejudice, ignorance, and fixed habits and opinions, has been the fate of the Department at every step which the extraordinary exigencies of this war have compelled it to take. While it is not difficult to criticize and point out mistakes in a new description of vessels which the change in naval warfare has suddenly called into existence, and to suggest alterations and improvements on what has already transpired, it is a satisfaction to the Department which was compelled to encounter this opposition to know that this class of vessels, subjected at the beginning to ridicule and subsequently to obloquy and denunciation, has been successfully tried in battle and in storm—that these vessels have equalled the expectations of the country in periods of peril, and have been extensively copied abroad. Other Governments are adopting them, while many of the discontented of our own country still question the wisdom of building vessels of the class which has at a critical moment rendered unequalled service to the Union and saved the capital of the nation.

In encouraging contrast with the illiberal and prejudiced opinions which have opposed all improvements, denounced them in advance as failures, and been dissatisfied even with successful results, are the observations and reflections of the sagacious and sensible author of the recent valuable work on "English and French neutrality," who, appreciating the difficulties of the Department, remarks at page 458 of his instructive volume:

"It is no small proof of ability in the management of the Navy that there was skill enough to provide, and independence enough to use, a form of war-ship and a kind of cannon before untried, but which time and experience have shown were alone of all ships and weapons then known capable of meeting the emergency."

At the present time the call for light-draught iron-clads comes from every squadron engaged in this struggle. Acting Rear Admiral Lee says that within the limits of his command there must be a large increase of light-draught iron-clads. Vice Admiral Farragut, before he left the scene of his great exploits, asked for additional iron-clads especially those of light draught, and declared that the coast could not be held unless he had them. In each of the blockading and river squadrons they are required.

Nearly two years have elapsed since any contracts have been entered into for this class of vessels, and it is hoped the present war is so near its close that no further expenditures for additional ones will be necessary; but should the war continue a year longer more will be wanted.

My acknowledgments are due to the committee for this opportunity to express my views. I shall feel under obligations to them or others, as will the whole country, for any improvements or suggestions which they may propose in consequence of their investigations, or for any undetected errors or mistakes which they may discover, in order that their conclusions and recommendations in this great emergency may be brought to the aid of the Department on this most interesting and important subject.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.
B. F. WADE,
Chairman of the Committee on the Conduct of the War.

Mr. President, here is the committee on the conduct of the war pursuing an ex parte examination, calling before it whom it pleases, and only whom it pleases, reaching the conclusion that these vessels are a failure. The Secretary of the Navy, surrounded by naval officers, seeing daily, if not hourly, the men who are conversant with naval constructions and the performance of naval vessels, having reports at the end of every week from the experts and inspectors who are placed in charge of the construction of these vessels, knowing what the reports are from the officers who are in command of the various squadrons of the performances of similar or nearly similar vessels, comes to the conclusion that they are not failures; but on the contrary that they will be of great value to the Government. Now, what is the wise course for us to pursue? Would it be wise for us, upon a supply bill, an appropriation bill, on the mere suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, predicated upon testimony that is not before us, which we have not an opportunity to read, or to analyze, or to examine at all, to undertake to condemn these vessels as though we were naval experts, revolutionize the entire Navy Department, and put it into commission? Could a more absurd proposition be submitted to us? After hearing this letter from the Secretary, is any one satisfied that we have squandered $10,000,000 upon these iron-clads?

In regard to these light-draught iron-clads, the facts are very simple. We had a board that sat originally in 1861 to determine the character of the vessels that should be built with the million and a half of dollars appropriated at the extra session in July of that year for the construction of iron-clad vessels-of-war. That board was composed of three superior officers in the Navy. They reported in favor of three different classes of vessels. They reported in favor of the Ironsides, which is an excellent vessel; in favor of the Galena, which has turned out to be a failure; and they said to Mr. Ericsson, who proposed to build the original Monitor, that he might build that vessel for a given sum of money, a small price, and run his own risk upon her; if she turned out to be a success the Government would take her, and if otherwise it would not. That Monitor, at the time she fought the Merrimack, and relieved us of the great weight that rested upon every man here in Washington after the destruction of the Congress and Cumberland, was not the property of the United States, but belonged to John Ericsson and the men who were associated with him in building her.

Whenever the Government has any of these works going on at private yards it directs an engineer to supervise the work, and to see that the contractors put the proper material and the proper kind of workmanship in the vessel. The engineer in the Navy who was engaged in that business in New York at the beginning of the work on the first monitor was Mr. A. C. Stimers, the gentleman who was the witness before the committee on the conduct of the war. He is quite a skillful man. I believe he has the reputation of being an excellent engineer. He was associated with Mr. Ericsson, and Mr. Ericsson furnished to him the computations, or they made them together, as to the floating capacity, or the buoyancy, or the displacement, or whatever may be the technical term, of the different vessels of the monitor type that were built. When the contract was made for building these light-draught iron-clads, the Department directed that they would be built under the supervision, with the advice, and under the direction of Ericsson and Stimers, as all the preceding ones had been built. But it seems that some misunderstanding grew up between Ericsson and Stimers, and Mr. Stimers, without letting the Department know anything about it, undertook to make the computations himself, unaided by and without consulting Ericsson. He never sent the plans or specifications of these vessels to the Navy Department as is testified before you here this evening by both John Lenthall and Benjamin F. Isherwood. There was where the trouble arose. There was a mistake made in the computation of the displacement of the vessels. There is no question about that. That mistake was not detected until the first vessel was launched, and would not have occurred had Mr. Stimers consulted with Mr. Ericsson as he had been instructed to do, and as he had done from the time the first monitor was contracted for.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what it is proposed by the Senator from Ohio that we should do. This amendment provides:

And be it further enacted, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist of the vice admiral, one rear admiral, one commodore, one captain, one commander, and one lieutenant commander, over which the Secretary of the Navy or the officer of highest rank present shall preside; and when the subject under consideration shall appertain to the duties of any bureau in the Navy Department, the chief of such bureau shall be a member of the board, and entitled to sit and vote on the subject.

I should be pleased if the Senator would inform me what will be the tenure of office of this Board of Admiralty.

Mr. WADE. I suppose they will hold their offices at the will of the President, as others do. I suppose the President will have power to turn them out of office and displace them if he sees fit, as there is no time limited.

Mr. GRIMES. Five naval officers, officers of the line, sea officers, are provided for who are to hold their offices during the will and pleasure of the President according to the construction the Senator from Ohio gives here, and the Secretary of the Navy is to preside over them. It is to be a kind of New England town meeting. If any question comes before this Admiralty Board in connection with any one of the bureaus, the head of that bureau is then to be permitted to come in and participate in the discussions.

Has the Senator forgotten, or has he not been informed that within the last few years a great revolution has come over all the navies of the world? Does he not know that the most important officer on board of every ship-of-war, next to the man actually in command, is the engineer? Is he going to intrust the whole Navy of the United States to the hands of five line officers, without any consultation or advice or uniting with them and giving any voice to the staff officers of the Navy?

Mr. WADE. It is provided that they may take the advice of any one skilled.

Mr. GRIMES. Can they not do that now?

Mr. WADE. They do not.

Mr. GRIMES. I assert that they do. I assert that there has not been any important measure taken by the Navy Department in the last four years without calling to its aid a board of officers, and the advantage of the present system over that proposed is obvious. There are some particular officers who are experts in ordnance. The Secretary of the Navy can convene a board of experts of five or seven or nine men who are distinguished in that particular department; they would be able to report something that would be valuable to the Secretary of the Navy and advantageous to the country. But every question in regard to ordnance is to be submitted, under this proposition of the Senator from Ohio, to a board of sea officers who may or may not know anything about ordnance. We have had time and time again boards of engineers assembled to which various questions have been referred by the Secretary of the Navy. They have been composed of experts in that particular Department. The advice that they have been in the habit of giving to the Secretary of the Navy has been of value and will continue to be of value to the Government; but of what value, I pray to be informed, would be the opinion of these five sea officers in regard to the construction of engines? They know no more about engines than the Senator from Ohio or I know about them, and I apprehend that we are about equally ignorant on that subject. So, also, in relation to various special branches of the service. The amendment further is:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the board shall deliberate in common and advise the Secretary on any matters relating to naval organization, naval legislation, the construction, equipment, and armament of vessels, navy-yards, and other naval establishments, and the direction, employment, and disposition of the naval forces in time of war, when required by him. All such opinions shall be recorded.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That no vessel-of-war shall be built or materially altered, nor any guns of new construction ordered or adopted, nor any engine for any vessel-of-war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon; and all courts-martial ordered by the Secretary of the Navy shall be detailed by the board.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That all invitations for plans or proposals for any of the works above mentioned shall be prepared by the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary; and all bids or offers or proposals for the same shall be opened in the presence of the board, and the award made by it, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary may add to the board from time to time other officers of the Navy eligible to the position of chief of bureau, not exceeding three at any time, for consultation on any of the above subjects. The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects, in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

Mark the second section of the proposed amendment. As I construe it, it virtually takes the control of the Navy from the Secretary and gives it to this board. Not the most trivial thing can be done by him independently of the board, and he is expressly denied the power to even detail a court-martial.

This board may take the advice of engineers and naval architects, but there is nothing requiring them to do it. The Senator does not put a naval architect, or constructor, or engineer upon the board, and—that is a very important item—he puts upon it no one to represent the supply department of the Navy, but he leaves the whole charge and control of the Navy, in fact, to this board of line officers, saying that they may if they choose ask the advice, not receive the counsel of, not to allow to participate in their deliberations, these officers of staff branches of the service.

The amendment means neither more nor less than this, if it means anything: to put the Naval Department into commission, to put it into leading strings, to put it in the control of some line officers who have been for a long time in the service; or else it means to furnish to the Naval Department a subterfuge by which it can at all times avoid responsibility. Either it means to give the control of the Navy Department to these commissioners, or else the effect will be to furnish the Secretary of the Navy the means in the future of avoiding all responsibility for his acts by thrusting everything off upon this board of commissioners. Do you wish to divide responsibility thus? Do you wish to give the Secretary of the Navy an opportunity to shuffle off all responsibility for his acts upon this board of irresponsible officers, who hold their commissions by a life tenure? I surely do not.

Yet, Mr. President, that will be the effect of this amendment if adopted. That is the effect of the British admiralty administration to-day. There is nothing that the members of the naval profession in England are so anxious to get rid of as their admiralty system, after which this amendment is modeled. They saw fit two hundred years ago to put their office of lord high admiral into commission, and it is now wielded by just about such a board as the Senator has proposed to create here, and what is the result of it? Precisely the result that I predict will follow here. A British writer on the admiralty administration says:

"It is unnecessary to insist at any length on the evil of divided councils, which must often occur among six persons brought together by the chapter of accidents, without previous knowledge of each other's views, and in fact the admiralty often represents nothing so completely as the endless diversity of opinions which prevail among naval officers; a diversity which on the other hand is partly accounted for by the absence of any standard course of policy to be discovered in the conduct of successive naval administrations."

And he says, further:

"With respect to naval officers the cases not more encouraging, for the only one subject on which there is general agreement among them is the utter helplessness of any good result arising from a system which is left to hang like a blight over the navy."

That is a navy board which the Senator from Ohio would induce the American Senate to adopt and incorporate into our system. Sir Charles Napier, a great naval authority, says:

"Believing, as I do, that no permanent good can be done for the service until the Board of Admiralty is abolished, I shall point out what appears to me would be the best mode of ruling the navy, although that step has not been taken."

Sir George Cockburn has said:

"Having filled the station of confidential or principal sea lord of the admiralty for more than seventeen years, I feel that my opinion regarding the constitution of the board may sooner or later be deemed worthy of consideration and attention. I am induced, therefore, to place in writing the decisions to which my experience has brought me on this point.

"I have no hesitation in stating that I consider the present establishment of that board to be the most unsatisfactory and least efficient for its purpose that could have been devised."

Mr. President, if you adopt this scheme for a Board of Admiralty, one or two things will follow: either the appointments that will be made under it will be made by the President of the United States upon the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy, and therefore you will have no more nor less than the tools, the pets, or the friends of the Secretary of the Navy to compose it; or the appointments will be made independently of him and will be antagonistic to him, and thus you will secure divided councils. Which of the horns of that dilemma will the Senate prefer? Suppose that a new Secretary of the Navy should come into office on the 4th of March, will not the President detail or appoint for his associates in this board men whom he will designate, with whom he is familiar, and with whom he is willing to cooperate? Or, if the present Secretary shall be continued, do you suppose the President will select men whom Mr. Welles will not desire to unite in his councils? If they are not thus appointed, if the President does not regard the wishes of the Secretary, as I suppose he will, he will select men who are in opposition and in hostility to him, and in that case how will the Navy Department be conducted? You will have such confusion as no executive officer in this Government was ever yet cursed with.

Mr. President, I trust that it is hardly necessary for me to say anything more this evening in opposition to the adoption of this amendment. I believe that a more disastrous measure for the Navy could not be devised. I know that there are some officers who are in favor of it. I am tolerably familiar with the sentiment of the Navy, and while some of the older officers who have spoken with me, and others who have not spoken with me, with whom I am acquainted, are in favor of it, I know that the bone and sinew, the heart and the muscle of the Navy, the men who do the labor and who are destined to do it, the men in mature life, and from that down to the young passed midshipmen, are utterly and wholly hostile to it.

Sir, what has been our experience on this subject? We had this Navy board once or something tantamount to it. As a friend said to me yesterday, when the proposition was introduced here, "When we got rid of the old board in 1842 we felt as Sindbad the sailor felt when the Old Man of the Sea was lifted off his shoulders." It was an incubus on the Navy, and was so regarded at that time by everybody except some of the old post captains who were assigned as members of the board. It was an inefficient organization, and was so considered by every one whose opinion was worth anything. Every nation on the face of the earth that has had it or anything like it is attempting to abolish it. The Senator from Ohio proposes that we now in a time of war, when of all other times there should not be any division in council, shall adopt it, and make it part of our system, without any consideration, and without any report by a committee of this body in favor of it, and adopt it, too, upon an appropriation bill!

Mr. President, I have been asked two or three times in private conversation, by members of this body and of the other House, why it is that we have not built any other iron vessel of the description of the Ironsides, why we have not built larger vessels corresponding with the large vessels that have been built by France and England.

Mr. WADE. They are failures; that is the reason.

Mr. GRIMES. That is one reason, and it is also because the Senate and House of Representatives very wisely refused to do it. The Navy Department, it will be remembered by the members of this body, made estimates for large iron-clad ships, in obedience to the expressed wishes of the commercial cities on the Atlantic coast, and sent those estimates here. We refused to vote them. For one, I refused my vote because I relied upon that system which is now proved to be the best naval system in the world, with the best ships for the purpose that the American nation desires to accomplish. Everybody admits that the monitors are an admirable sea defense; that for the purpose for which they were originally designed, the protection of our harbors, nothing exceeds them; the Senator from Ohio says "Provided you can get them from one harbor to another." Have any gone down except the earliest built and most incomplete, the Monitor and Weehawken? Have they not been taken from our north Atlantic cities around Cape Hatteras to the Gulf of Mexico?

The trouble about the monitors has arisen from the fact that their friends have claimed too much for them while their enemies have too greatly undervalued them. The truth, as is generally the case, lies in the mean between the two parties. I am not much of a believer in them as sea-going vessels; I would not recommend them as cruisers; but for harbor defense, the purpose for which they were originally devised, they are unapproached by anything yet invented by the ingenuity of man.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me for an instant to make a suggestion on that point?

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish simply to state that there are demands for an increase of the Navy on the Pacific coast, and there is great propriety in making that increase; and in some of my most recent conferences with the Navy Department they have announced it as their intention to send some of the monitors around through the straits of Magellan to that coast, and said at the same time that they were willing to take passage in them.

Mr. GRIMES. In answer to the suggestion which has just been made it will not be inappropriate for me to read a short extract from a report of Admiral Porter in regard to vessels of the monitor class of which the Monadnock is the type. Here let me say what may perhaps be known to every Senator, but I will state it nevertheless, that the Monadnock is the only one of these vessels that has been built by the United States Government at a navy-yard. All others have been built by contractors; and many of the difficulties that have been experienced in regard to these vessels have originated from the fact stated by Mr. Welles in his letter to the Senator from Ohio, that the vessels were not made at our navy-yards, under our own superintendence, and have suffered from overweight and underweight and defective materials. Where the vessels have been made at our own navy-yards, under our own superintendence, by our own workmen, no such difficulties have ever been experienced. Admiral Porter says:

"As to the Monadnock, she could ride out a gale at anchor in the Atlantic ocean. She is certainly a most perfect success, so far as the hull and machinery are concerned, and is only defective in some minor details, which in the building of these vessels require the superintendence of a thorough seaman and a practical and ingenious man."

"The Monadnock is capable of crossing the ocean alone, (when her compasses are once adjusted properly,) and could destroy any vessel in the French or British navy, lay their towns under contribution, and return again (provided she could pick up coal) without fear of being followed. She could certainly clear any harbor on our coast of blockaders, in case we were at war with a foreign Power. As strong and thick as the sides of this vessel are, one heavy shot from Fort Fisher indented the iron on her side armor, without, however, doing any material damage. These vessels have laid five days under a fire from Fort Fisher, anchored less than eight hundred yards off, and though fired at a great deal, they were seldom hit, and received no injury, except to boats and light matter about decks, which were pretty well cut to pieces."

I suppose that is sufficient testimony as to the ability of vessels of that description passing from port to port along our coast.

I was saying, Mr. President, that I think we have the best Navy in the world for our purposes. What are our purposes? First, to protect our own harbors; and if there are any vessels superior to the monitors for that purpose I confess I do not know what they are. Such is not only the judgment of naval men in this country, but of the commercial marine and of foreign Powers, many of which are at this moment engaged in constructing them. Some have already been built, and many more are being built by the Powers of continental Europe; and some very similar, known as the Captain Cowper Coles's pattern, are being built by Great Britain. Then we have the fastest sea-going naval vessels in the world. I know that that has been denied, but I have here the testimony to prove it if it be doubted; testimony that cannot be controverted.

All we want is the monitors to protect our harbors, and then fast vessels to destroy the commerce of a hostile Power. It is utter folly for us to undertake to build a navy with which we can compete with France and England in immense naval battles. That is not our policy. Our true policy is to protect ourselves at home, and then to sweep the commerce of our enemy from the sea; and the system that has been pursued by the Navy Department during the last four years in building up the Navy we now have is calculated to accomplish that purpose in a higher degree than any other plan that could possibly be devised.

Mr. McDougall. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. What is the reason that no action has ever been taken under the law authorizing the President to issue letters of marque so as to place our volunteer marine on the seas to enable us to maintain ourselves? I should like to understand that, because the Senator speaks ex cathedra.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not speak ex cathedra. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner] probably can answer that question more satisfactorily than I can. I was in favor, as the Senator from California will remember, of the passage of the law authorizing the issue of letters of marque, and the Senator from Massachusetts was opposed to it, and as he has the conduct of foreign affairs here, he can answer better than I can.

Mr. McDougall. I should like to ask him, then, for I have been in great trouble to know, the reason why letters of marque have not been granted; for that would have swept the adversary from the seas.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not conceive that it is necessary for me to pursue this subject any further. I have only a word to say in regard to the charge that was made to-day by the Senator from New Hampshire against the Navy Department, that it had assumed extraordinary powers in the creation of acting rear admirals. It will be remembered that when this war began, and until 1862, the highest officer in the American Navy was a captain. When one of those captains was appointed to the command of a fleet or a squadron he was called a flag-officer, and from that time and ever afterward took the courtesy title of commodore, there not then being any such rank as commodore. On the 21st of December, 1861, Congress passed a law declaring—

"That the President of the United States shall have the authority to select any officer from the grades of captain or commander in the Navy, and assign him to the command of a squadron with the rank and title of a 'flag-officer,' and any officer thus assigned shall have the same authority and receive the same obedience from the commanders of ships in his squadron holding commissions of an older date than his that he would be entitled to receive were his commission the oldest; and to receive, when so employed, the pay to which he would have been entitled if he were on the active list of the Navy."

After the passage of this law Congress passed another act by which it authorized the creation of the grade of rear admiral. In three or four instances persons were detailed from the ranks of captain or commander to command squadrons, and as the title of acting rear admiral, after the passage of the law creating the office of rear admiral, corresponded with the title of flag officer under the law of 1861, they were designated in letters from the Department and in public documents by courtesy as "acting rear admirals," and that is the only way in which that assumption of the Navy Department originated. The rank was the same and the pay the same.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator a question, whether they are not designated in the letter he read from the Secretary of the Navy to the Senator from Ohio as acting rear admirals?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. When they are thus appointed do they not receive rear admiral's pay?

Mr. GRIMES. I understand that they do not receive rear admiral's pay. They are called acting rear admirals precisely as the Secretary three years ago would have called the present Rear Admiral Smith a commodore, he being then only a captain.

Mr. HALE. I understand the fact to be contrary to that, and that they do receive the pay and emoluments of a rear admiral while they are in that command as acting rear admirals.

Mr. GRIMES. I have understood the reverse of that. They receive the pay a flag officer draws, whatever that may be.

Mr. HALE. I had it from the Secretary of the Navy himself, for I asked him and he told me it was so.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, at this time of the night I do not propose to enter into an argument on this matter at large. Indeed I never supposed that the amendment which I offered would lead to so protracted a discussion.

The reason why I mentioned the failure of the light-draught monitors was simply for the purpose of showing that something was defective in the organization of this Department in the matter of ship-building or the construction of vessels. Undoubtedly the committee on the conduct of the war would not solemnly have been charged with the duty of making these inquiries unless the Senate had been pretty thoroughly impressed with the idea that there was something wrong about this matter. Most assuredly no member of that committee ever sought this investigation. It was furthest from my thoughts, furthest from my wishes to be engaged in any such enterprise; but when the Senate deliberately made it our duty to make these inquiries I went cheerfully into it, and we have labored pretty hard and endeavored to understand all about it. We have not acted ex parte, as the Senator from Iowa supposes we have. We examined all the high naval officers that seemed to have a peculiar knowledge upon this subject without the least inquiry what their bias was or what their opinions were, or anything else about them. If they stood in such relation to these light-draught monitors, which were the subject-matter of our inquiry, as to induce the committee to believe that they had any particular knowledge on the subject, we took their testimony, and we have taken a great deal of it, and I expect in due time a report will be made, and that evidence will all be before the Senate, and I believe that evidence will throw a great deal of light on this subject.

That there is something wrong in the organization of the Government that has led to such an error as this does not need very much argument. I do not place it on the testimony of Mr. Stimers, or any other particular witness. Indeed, to show that these twenty monitors for which $10,000,000 were appropriated have proved an entire failure for the original purpose for which they were designed, I should not want any other testimony than that furnished by the Department. They tell you that they were of no value as they stood; they have said so in one of their communications to us. The whole appropriation which was made for these monitors was expended on them before it was pretended they would be of any value whatever, because they could not carry their armament and the necessary naval supplies and coal. They have divested six of them of their turrets; they have divested them of all the weight they could with propriety for the purpose of using them as they say as torpedo-boats, a thing never thought of in their original construction. They were to be light-draught monitors, not drawing more than six and a half feet of water, for the purpose of navigating our shallow harbors in the South and ascending our rivers. That was the contract, that was the design, and it has proved a total failure, and out of the $10,000,000 that was appropriated for that purpose you have not yet got a scintilla of use. About two years have expired; the war, I hope, is near its end; and yet from this great appropriation you have not so far received any benefit whatever.

I have said that something was wrong in this matter. I do not charge any moral delinquency on anybody. I suppose the Navy Department have done all they knew how to do under the circumstances. I can excuse them in a great measure because of the immense amount of business they had on their hands. I believe their organization there has been entirely incompetent to the vast work that the Government enjoined on them to do. What was Mr. Lenthall, that the Senator from Iowa says in any other Government would have been a lord or a noble for his merits, doing, that he could not attend to this business? He did not make any calculation as to the displacement; the Senator says he had nothing to do with it. Where was Mr. Isherwood, another man who it seems ought to have had something to do with it? He swears he had nothing to do with it. What was he doing? What was he there for? What were this naval bureau, if you please to call it so, doing? Were they building any ships?

Mr. Stimers says that before he could have time to make the calculation of the displacement he was sent on other business for the Government, and had to leave it in its unfinished state, and to trust to the young engineer of whom I spoke the other day; and he says that he enjoined it upon the board of construction, or the bureau, or whatever it was, to make the calculation over again; not that he distrusted the young man, but he feared that there might be a mistake, and it was necessary that it should be very particularly looked at.

Gentlemen say that these vessels will ultimately be made good. I do not know but that they will. I know that on that point there is the greatest variety of opinion among men most competent to judge. Is not Admiral Gregory a man that ought to be avouched as a witness in such a case? We have the testimony of the highest and the best naval officers you have got, some of them believing that they will never be good for anything, others hoping that by expending a vast amount of additional money that has not yet been appropriated by Congress, something may be made out of them. In order to try the experiment whether they will be good for anything or not, you have to expend $90,000 on each of these vessels to build them up, to say nothing of other expenses. I suppose you will have to expend full two million dollars more than you have already appropriated for no better purpose than to try the experiment whether anything useful can be made out of them.

Mr. COLLAMER. Have they not tried it on one?

Mr. WADE. They try it on all, and in my judgment that is very wrong. The building of these light-draught monitors was in itself an experiment. None of this class had ever been built before. There had been a monitor built, but not of the same class. It was considered as an experiment, and yet they contracted for twenty at once, all of the same model, and they have all failed. There is not a good one among them; there is not one that you can do anything with. Two long years have passed and you have not yet derived a single iota of benefit from the appropriation of the $10,000,000. Yet when we are charged to inquire into this, and when we find these vessels to be a failure, because we are anxious that some remedy should be applied we are treated as we have been. I do not blame the Navy Department about it, but I say there never was a nation that expended as much for naval purposes in the same time as we have done. Nay, sir, we have incurred a debt in four years almost as large as Great Britain has incurred in two hundred years, and she has been at war nearly one half that time.

I say, then, we must make some different arrangement. We want additional help. If you have no board of construction that can look to the expenditure of $10,000,000, that will not make the models of the ships, that will not look to them and see whether they are right or wrong, and it is not shown that they are doing any other business, I think it is time for us to interpose. What are they there for? Why do you keep them there? Why do you take a young man like Stimers and send him off on this expedition to construct these vessels alone, with nobody to help him, and yet send him on other business at the same time? There is something wrong about it. You have not help enough. You want a board there that can superintend these matters all the time. You want something like what this amendment proposes. If you do not want the board to be composed entirely of line officers, propose amendments. I suppose they are as good men to superintend this work as anybody else. The Senator says there are no engineers proposed by this amendment to be on the board. That is very true. I have no objection, however, to substituting the best engineer in the world for any one of the officers named in the amendment. The idea was that these men are to preside over the Department and look into all these matters, somewhat as we now send an eminent officer in the Navy to superintend the building of a ship. He is no great ship-builder, I suppose, but nevertheless he attends to it, he superintends it, he sees that everything goes on right. So this board is to superintend matters, not that its members are to be mechanics, not that they are to wield the ax and the auger, but they are to employ and consult the best men and the best skill in the country. It is to bring additional force into the heads of your Department there to aid and assist in this business. That is my object. I believe you have not got men enough there; you have not got force enough at the head to do all this work. I do not believe that the Department which was organized for looking after a Navy consisting of a few old wooden ships is competent on that old arrangement to manage a naval force so vastly increased as ours has been, so that there is a hundred-fold more to do, and which ought to be done upon new and improved principles. I do not believe that the old arrangement is altogether adequate to it. It is unreasonable to suppose so, and the result of trying shows that just what a man would naturally have expected has turned out to be true; we have tried it and it has failed.

I am not going into an argument about these iron-clads. I believe with the Senator from Iowa that many of the monitors of the largest class will be the most formidable ships in the world for harbor defense. I am inclined to think so. I think it is the best model, because, though I am not an engineer or a mechanic, I can see that it is the best form; you can make your armor thicker, stronger, more impenetrable with the same surface in a monitor than you can in any other form of vessel. That is the reason. The great ships built in Europe and cased with iron have utterly failed because of the enormous surface they have undertaken to plate with armor; the keel is so great that they go to the bottom; they will not sail; they cannot do anything; the mark for the shot of an opposing force is too great; but your monitor, with a turret that is movable and with a smaller compass, may have her armor three times thicker and perfectly impenetrable and still be able to float. That is the reason why ours are the best. I believe with the Senator from Iowa that they are among the most formidable ships in the world.

I hope that Senator will bring his astute mind with his usual zeal to inquire into the armor they carry and the guns they carry to see that this best of all ships and stoutest of all ships shall be armed with a gun that can be used without destruction to your own men; for our investigations have shown that some of these great guns are deficient. You ought not to rest contented with the best ships in the world armed with a gun that you cannot depend upon. I believe there is a gun now known, and which may be brought into use, that will be as strong as the ship on board of which it is placed; but you have not got it now, and you will find with all the vast expenditure you have laid out on these great monitors, that unless you improve their armament you have but half done your work and left the most essential part undone. The committee on the conduct of the war have made a report on that subject which has been sent to the Naval Committee, and I hope they will attend to it and perfect the work.

I am not complaining of your monitors; I am finding no fault generally with your Navy Department; I do not intend to find fault with it. I know the immense difficulties with which the Department has had to grapple. It has had the shortest possible time in which to create the most formidable navy in the world, and very well, in my judgment, has it accomplished the result.

The Senator says that the committee on the conduct of the war have taken ex parte evidence; for what? My God, sir, I know no party but my country in matters of this kind. Why should I by this inquiry seek, as the Senator insinuates, to pick out an officer here and there for the purpose of obtaining testimony to support some favorite theory? God forbid. I wish to elicit the truth. I have no other interest in it, no other purpose to subserve, than to come at the truth from the best lights that the Navy can furnish us. Such we have got, and in due time you shall have it before you.

Complaint is made because the deposition of Mr. Stimers, an important witness before the committee to show the inadequacy, I think, of the organization of the Navy to accomplish all its great purposes, is yet in the reporter's notes. We cannot help that. Mr. Stimers was actively engaged in the Navy; he has but just returned from a distant scene of labor; he has been an active man, and it has only been within a few days past that we could get him as a witness before the committee. I do not intend to go into the evidence we have taken. I simply say that it shows, what stands confessed by the Navy Department and by everybody else, that these light-draught monitors are a failure; certainly the original design or purpose they were intended to execute is a confessed failure by everybody. There is no contrariety of evidence upon that point. It is a matter of some little consequence to know whether we have thrown away our $10,000,000 or not. We certainly have not reaped any benefit from that expenditure. I hope we shall yet. I hope it will prove that those witnesses are correct who think something can be made out of the vessels, but still I say that I have the gravest doubts myself on that point. The original purpose is abandoned. I do not know of any one who has been called to the stand who believes that you can ascend rivers with them, who believes they are adequate for the purpose for which they were originally designed; but some hope they may be used in some way for harbor defense, and some talk of them as torpedo-boats, as I have already said. But what kind of a torpedo-boat would a vessel make that cannot go faster than three and a half miles an hour and which cannot be trusted by herself at that? for not one of these vessels has ever gone on her own hook ten miles. When one of them has been taken from harbor to harbor she has been dragged there by a boat towing her along. How would one of them approach a torpedo under tow of a boat that certainly would be ruined by the explosion? The best nautical men say that would be the consequence. These vessels are not fast enough for that purpose; they are too logy. That is an afterthought entirely. As it could not be seen that they would be good for anything else, it was thought that perhaps they might be used for this purpose, and hence the attempt to use them in this way after they have failed for the purpose for which they were designed. It was then thought that an attempt might be made to use them as torpedo-boats, hoping that something might be done with them for that purpose. It has been found, however, that that cannot be done, that they are not good for that purpose, and that you have the best constructed torpedo-boat which can be built at one fifth the cost of one of these vessels.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate in arguing this question. I believe that it was incumbent upon the committee to whom this inquiry was referred, and who were directed to make it, if they found anything that they believed to be defective in the organization of the Department, to propose a remedy, if they could contrive one. That is my idea; and if the Senate judge that the amendment that I have offered is not the way to do it, let them help me to perfect it. If they will not do it, we must let the thing drop, and the result will be that you say that an organization of the Navy Department and of the board of construction, which sends out a young man carelessly charged with other business at the same time and leaves this great work to be done in this careless manner, is the best you can do. I want a board that will be adequate to the great work that we have for them to accomplish, that will be on hand there all the time, that will employ the best mechanical skill in the country in the shape of engineers, ship-builders, and naval architects.

The Senator tells me that I am for putting the Navy Department into commission. Why, sir, the Navy Department is to be superior over this Board of Admiralty just as it is now, but it will be a more permanent organization; it will be an organization that I trust will try to do something, and not, like the old one, turn away and do nothing with these things. I ask you again what are they there for? Mr. Lenthall tells you he did not do anything about it. Mr. Isherwood says he would not or did not do anything about it, did not even know anything of the kind was going on. What were they about? They were not constructing any of the rest of these monitors; they were doing nothing that I know of. Why did not this man, who the Senator says ought to be a lord of the admiralty, raise a hand here? Why did he not know that there was work for him to do? Mr. Stimers was sent off to work with Mr. Ericsson, and they got into a misunderstanding, which resulted in a quarrel; but if Mr. Stimers tells the truth, the Department knew all about it all the time, and I think they were faulty in not attending to the matter more assiduously than they did. I know, however, that they had a great many other cares on their minds. They had everything to look to. They had a great Navy on their shoulders and they wanted help. They wanted such a board as I have proposed to be their advisers, to look to the construction of these vessels, and to employ skill to do it. I think so, and consequently I have offered this amendment. I believe it is a remedy for the defect. I have no idea that if you had had such a board, this fatal mistake could have been committed. I believe that your money would have been expended so that these monitors would be serving the country as they were designed to do to-day, ascending our rivers, cutting off the action of the guerrillas everywhere, and protecting our coast; but as the Department had not the strength, the power, the organization to do it, you have got nothing of them, and in my judgment you never will have anything.

Mr. McDougall. Mr. President I am impressed with the opinion that upon the committee on the conduct of the war there are three skillful naval constructors, and if George Steers was alive to-day he would not equal either one of them. I am impressed with the opinion that there are also three excellent engineers; that Ericsson is not equal to one of them; and the remaining member of the committee is a man of superabundant genius; knowing more than any one else about the business of how first to invent, and then to construct, and then to execute these vessels that belong to the high seas. If wisdom could culminate into an absolute and determinate form, be resolved into a globe, and be put down into the committee on the conduct of the war, it should be done by all means.

We all know that in the start of these vessels it was an experiment, an American experiment, which has resulted in great success. The Senator from Ohio is wrong when he says that the monitors have not been a success. There is the Comanche that, under great difficulties, having gone down into the sea on the coast of the Pacific, now sails her waters, a great success, and a safeguard to our coast.

Sir, we have done great things in the production of our iron-clads, and they make us now the most formidable Power upon the seas in the world. We have sea-going vessels, and we have coast-defending vessels. A small monitor is not intended for a far sea-going vessel, and yet it is able to go to sea, and to stand the sea as long as it can carry coal. Our improvements upon our first enterprise furnish us great ships that, as Porter says, can go abroad and command the ports of the world. This great triumph of American skill has done more to exhibit our strength, and the power possessed by the American people in comparison with any and all the other Governments of the world, than any single thing we have ever done.

I say this much as differing from the Senator from Ohio; and then, as I do not propose to make a speech, I wish to say a single word with regard to his proposition. If our Government is built on proper foundations, if our system has any value, if our powers have been properly distributed, it is not for us by legislation to usurp the power belonging to another and an independent department of the Government. I have been disposed to say, and have said, that our rights have somewhat been usurped by other departments of the Government; but one wrong does not justify another, and I maintain that it does not belong to the legislative department of the Government to put a commission around the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy and his appointees, so that he may not be able to direct the conduct of the Navy Department. I maintain in the first place that it is a departure from the Constitution, it is a departure from principle, and a departure from policy, and it ought for these reasons to be rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to offer an amendment as a new section:

And he it further enacted, That hereafter in all appointments of midshipmen to the Naval Academy the selections for such appointments in the several districts shall be made from the candidates according to their respective merits and qualifications, to be determined under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Navy shall from time to time prescribe.

I do not propose at this time of the evening to make a speech. I think my practice in the Senate will protect me from that imputation. At the last session, upon offering a similar amendment to the military appropriation bill, I adduced abundant evidence of the advantages of the plan of competitive examinations, and I endeavored to show that it had been recommended not only by the advice of the best educators, civil, naval, and military, in the country, but by the experience of the most military nation. It has long been the system of France, and it has been adopted recently into the military service of England, where all the traditions are aristocratic, but where they have found that while wealth, rank, and family may be made the test of promotion in the civil service, it is absolutely necessary to the success of the military service that appointments and promotions should be made by merit. I offer this amendment now because I have some cumulative evidence in its favor. We appoint every year a Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy. That board is selected from the best naval officers and from eminent men in civil life who have given attention to the subject of education, and that board annually makes recommendations. Now, sir, I desire to place before the country the recommendation which the last Board of Naval Visitors has made on this subject. I send to the desk, and ask the Secretary to read, the extract from the report which I have made.

The Secretary read, as follows:

"As the most direct blow to the hindrances which practically exclude a large portion of the youth of the country, no matter how strong may be their predilection or great their acquired fitness for the naval service, from even a chance of being admitted to this Naval School; as the most effectual preventive of the disappointments now experienced by individuals and families in the failure of many appointees to pass the entrance examination, or to meet even the low requirements of the first year's course; as the only effectual way of ridding the institution of the low average ability and attainments which characterize the lower sections of every class, and of bringing up the talent and scholarship and conduct of the whole guarantee to the average of the first two sections; as a sure guarantee against the early resignation of officers educated at the public expense for a life service in the Navy, and of a progressive and honorable career as long as life and health last; as a powerful attraction to draw to this department of the public service a fair share of the best talent and loftiest ambition of the youth of the country, and as a stimulus to their best efforts for self and school improvement for this purpose, the visitors recommend the immediate abandonment of the custom of selecting candidates for admission by individual patronage, in consideration of neighborhood, relationship, or party connection, or the better motives of the poverty, or public service of parents, and that all appointments be hereafter made in consideration of the personal merit of the applicant, ascertained by a public competitive examination, conducted before an impartial tribunal, constituted as shall be prescribed by law. Admission sought and obtained in this way will be honorable to the successful candidates, a source of pride to the neighborhood and State from which they come, a reward to the teachers who have prepared them, and a stimulus to the industry and good conduct of their comrades at home. The classes of the Academy replenished every year by new recruits, all of whom have sought the service from personal choice, and won the place by personal merit founded on natural aptitude and vigor of mind and acquired knowledge, and who regard the diligent improvement of these opportunities for professional study and practice as the true road to honorable promotion hereafter, to be gained by further industry and devotion, will at once have an average ability and scholarship equal to that now obtained by only five or six out of every hundred, and the dead weights, the re-examination, and the failures from inability, distaste, or want of preparatory knowledge, will forever disappear from the records of the Academy.

"These suggestions have not the merit of originality, nor the objections of novelty. The principle recommended has stood the test of seventy years' trial in France in naval and similar public schools, and is now in successful operation in England, as well as in most of the military schools of Europe. It has been again and again urged by thoughtful friends of this institution, and of our other national school at West Point, as the most effectual remedy for the evils complained of. The Academic Board of this Academy, in answer to a request from a committee in 1855 for its opinion on this point, replied: 'The Academic Board has long been of the opinion that the present system of appointing midshipmen without care in their selection was undermining the very existence of the institution. The records of the Academy show that scarcely more than one fourth of those admitted graduate. The fault lies with the appointing power, which has not kept the institution supplied with the proper material, and the board has been powerless in applying a remedy. It has done all in its power by recommending a higher standard of proficiency.' The visitors for 1863, in the report of their examinations, remark: 'After a careful examination of the subject, the board has been forced to the conclusion that the selection of candidates has not been made with sufficient reference to the want of the public service, but has been and continues to be regarded as a portion of the patronage of the members of Congress making the nominations. The evil does not stop here; for in many cases, after they have been appointed without regard to talents or fitness, and have obtained admission to the institution, and subsequently have been found incapable to pursue the studies of the class to which they belong, the influence of the same member of Congress originally nominating them is successfully used to continue them at the institution in obtaining authority for them to recommence their studies by joining a lower class, thus retaining those wanting in talents and fitness, to the exclusion of others of suitable qualifications that might be presented. An institution like this, in which the students are educated and supported by the Government, ought to have them selected from the highest and most promising youths of the country.'

"The same general principle, selection by merit, ascertained by the same general method, competitive examination, conducted on such conditions as Congress shall authorize or prescribe, has been recommended for appointments to the kindred national institution—the Military Academy at West Point—with the view of removing the same hindrances and remedying the same defects in the practical working of that school. That eminent military teacher and administrator, General Thayer, under whom the Academy, notwithstanding many hindrances and defects, attained its highest development, recommended the adoption of this principle at the outset of his administration, after having seen its successful operation in the military schools of France; and he has recently, after a lapse of nearly fifty years, all of them spent in actual experience or observation of the practical results of a different principle, renewed the recommendation in a communication to the Secretary of War. He has, within the present year, declared his belief that the adoption at the start, and the continuous recognition of this principle—the selection of candidates for admission on the ground of personal merit and aptitude for the special purposes of the institution, in appointments to the Military Academy—would have more than doubled its usefulness, would have prevented most of the difficulties of administration which it has encountered, would have prevented the popular prejudices which demagogues and disappointed parents and Congressmen have fostered, and would have gained for it a larger measure of the popular favor.

"The Visitors of the Military Academy for 1863, in their report to the Secretary of War, go into an extended discussion of the advantages and objections to this principle and mode of making appointments. To this document reference is made as embodying the convictions of this board as to the probable working of the same principle in admission to the Naval Academy."

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to any more reading of documents.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have waited here all day and heard Senators talk about the Democratic party, and there has not been until this evening one word said on the subject before the Senate; and now when I ask the attention of the Senate to the report of the Board of Visitors of the Academy, not suggestions by indifferent men, but the well-considered deliberations of those who, of all others in the country, are best qualified to decide on the question, and to whom questions affecting the Academy have been especially committed, Senators think that I am occupying their time very much to their inconvenience and am very much imposing on them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Nobody has said that.

Mr. HALE. I think as a matter of fact the statement which the Senator from Rhode Island makes, if he intends it to be applicable to the appointment of midshipmen in the naval service, is a mistake, and if the Board of Visitors to our Naval Academy mean to make that statement, it is a statement that I think is not founded in fact.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not certain that the naval appointments of Great Britain are made after a competitive examination, but the military appointments are, and have been since the Crimean war. At the time of the Crimean war the English Government found that they were far behind the French in the efficiency of their military service, and upon an investigation into the causes, it was decided that the reason they were behind the French was because the French made merit the test of appointment and promotion in the army, and the English made family the test; and the English have since adopted the French system in the military service.

Mr. HALE. I am not prepared to say how it is in the British military service; but I have made some inquiries in regard to their naval service, and I have visited some of their ships, and I understand that the appointments of midshipmen there are never made from boys over fourteen years of age. Fourteen years old is the extent. If you adopt this provision, and it becomes a law, the effect will be that the boys in towns where they have high schools and have made rapid advancement will universally get the appointments, and boys from the country, who do not have the advantage of these high schools and of the training and education obtained in them, will be entirely excluded. I think it is better to leave the matter as it now is.

The question being put upon the amendment, it was declared that it appeared to be carried in the affirmative.

A division was called for.

Mr. ANTHONY called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. Heretofore I have always voted against this amendment, but I am going to-night to vote for it. The object that is sought to be accomplished by the Senator from Rhode Island has always met my approbation, but it has seemed to me at the same time incapable of being carried properly into execution. I doubt it now; but I am willing to try it one year, and see what the result will be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator from California will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and let the amendment be attached and sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I did not call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Chair decided that the amendment had been carried in the affirmative, and then a division was called for, and I asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the call for the yeas and nays be withdrawn, and the Chair put the question again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays may be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope it will be done. I desire very much to have the bill passed to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection; and the call for the yeas and nays is withdrawn.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I submit the following amendment as a new section:

And he it further enacted, That so much of the proviso of the act of March 3, 1813, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the half calendar year beginning the 1st of January and ending the 30th of June, 1844," as requires that provisions and all materials of every name and nature for the use of the Navy be furnished by contract with the lowest bidder after advertisement, shall be and the same is hereby so far modified that it shall not apply to bunting delivered for the use of the Army and Navy, and that it shall be lawful for the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contract for bunting as their respective services require for a period not exceeding one year, and at a price not exceeding that at which an article of equal quality can be imported.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the restrictions that are contained in the section I think that amendment is right and proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and that the bill be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move now to take up the Army appropriation bill, with a view to let it stand as the unfinished business.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to remind the Senator from Ohio that there is a special order for one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have consulted the Senator who has the floor on that subject, and he is perfectly willing to let it be postponed until Monday. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that there are reasons why the Army appropriation bill should be disposed of to-morrow. The tax bill will come to us to-morrow, and the Committee on Finance will be engaged in its consideration next week, and probably will not be able to retain their seats in the Senate during the time it is under consideration. I desire, therefore, to have the Army appropriation bill passed to-morrow, and then I shall not interfere with other Senators.

Mr. SUMNER. Then, with the permission of the Senator from Ohio, in the absence of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] I propose that the special order for to-morrow be transferred to one o'clock on Monday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that will not be done. That bill has been in the way of everything else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business for the purpose of allowing some important reports to be made which will not take long.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that motion is put, I would like to ask to have the special order for one o'clock to-morrow taken up and transferred to Monday at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the motion cannot be entertained at the present time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 17, 1865.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. JOHN THURSH, of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to inquire into the cause of delay in getting out and delivering the Daily Globe, and to provide a remedy for such delay.

No objection was made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I merely desire to state that members will observe that the Globe is three or four days behind with our debates. We made an almost stupendous appropriation for the Congressional Globe during the last session of Congress, and with the express promise on the part of the publishers that the debates should be promptly delivered. It has fallen behind now at an earlier stage in the session than I have ever known it before, and it is very important for us that we should have the previous day's proceedings on our tables when we meet. And there is no reason for the delay. All that is wanted is that they should give us a little more force. If they have not reporters enough let them get a few more, and if they have not printers enough let them get a few more printers.

Mr. MALLORY. I will state that I do not think we have ever known, since I have been in Congress, a time at this period of the session at which the Daily Globe has not been behind to some extent, and I, for one, so far from regarding it as objectionable, think that it is fortunate, because when there is a discussion on an important subject and many speeches are made, the delay gives members an opportunity to revise their speeches, and I have no doubt the gentleman from Illinois has availed himself of such opportunities.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the speeches be delayed as long as gentlemen desire.

Mr. MALLORY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that if the publishers of the Globe were to employ a force constantly at the reporters' desk and in the printing office to have the Daily Globe at all times printed punctually, they would have ordinarily too large a force, and the expense would be very heavy from the fact that they would constantly have on hand a force too large for ordinary occasions, and too expensive.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am advised that the reporters are up with the proceedings of the House, and that the proceedings are written out every day ready to be put in the Globe. The fault is in not having printers enough to set up the copy. I speak of compositors and printers, and so far as that is concerned it is certainly the duty of the proprietors of the Globe to get printers enough to enable them to lay the proceedings on our tables the next morning. We pay them with that understanding.

Mr. MALLORY. I have no objection to having the resolution passed.

Mr. RADFORD. I object to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection comes too late.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Certainly; the resolution has been discussed.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been debated, and it is too late to make objection to its reception.

Mr. RADFORD. Then I suggest to the gentleman that all the printing is behind. The objection I have is to singling out the Globe. I would move to amend the resolution by extending the inquiry to all the printing that is behind.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RADFORD. Then I suggest that the gentleman insert after the word "Globe" the words "and also as to the cause of the delay in all the other printing."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will accept that modification of my resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to state what I learn to be the cause of this delay, and it is one not peculiar to the Globe office. I understand it to be impossible at this time in Washington city to get compositors for the various printing establishments. The same difficulty has presented itself at the Public Printing Office and perhaps at most of the newspaper offices in the city of Washington. I am very sure that this or some equally good cause explains the delay.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Committee on Printing can ascertain the cause. But I do not think it a good reason that they cannot get compositors enough. If they are short I will turn in myself. I am a pretty good compositor.

Mr. MALLORY. I think that is the most useful purpose to which we can apply the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.] I hope he will go at it at once.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I profess to be an adept in that art. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOUISIANA ELECTION CASES.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That A. P. Field is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the second congressional district in Louisiana.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES also, from the same committee, presented a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That W. D. Mann is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the third congressional district in Louisiana.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ARKANSAS ELECTION CASES.

Mr. DAWES also, from the Committee of Elections, presented a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That T. M. Jacks is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district in Arkansas.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES also, from the same committee, presented a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That J. M. Johnson is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the third congressional district in Arkansas.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DIGEST OF ELECTION CASES.

Mr. A. W. CLARK reported from the Committee on Printing the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed one thousand extra copies of the Digest of Election Cases, for the use of this House.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, this Digest when prepared closed necessarily with the beginning of this Congress, because it was impossible to embrace in it the cases of this Congress. But now, the present Congress being about to close, these cases can be included, and I think it very important that they should be, for they involve principles of importance. I therefore move to amend the resolution by adding the words, "including the cases which have occurred during the present Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution as amended was agreed to.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK also reported from the Committee on Printing the following resolution, on which he moved the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed thirty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents, twenty thousand for the members of the House of Representatives, and ten thousand for the Commissioner of Patents.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. A. W. CLARK also reported from the Committee on Printing the following resolution:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the report on the commercial relations of the United States with foreign nations, for the year ending September 30, 1864, be printed for the State Department.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire what number of copies of this report are printed for the use of the House.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Three thousand. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that, in accordance with a law passed at the last session, a certain number of these documents are printed for the House and the Senate. But it is found that the State Department require one thousand copies, while the law provides for furnishing that Department with only five hundred. The object of this resolution is to give the Department an additional five hundred.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to inquire of the gentleman why the State Department requires one thousand copies of this report.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. They are required for distribution among consuls and ministers abroad. Five hundred copies are insufficient for the purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is the work in type at the present time?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. It is being set up. It has not yet been printed. No resetting of the type will be necessary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No portion of the work has yet been printed?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. No, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to giving the State Department the number that is absolutely required; but I thought one thousand a larger number than was necessary. But if the gentleman speaks by authority of the Department, and says that that number is necessary, I will interpose no objection.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I do speak by authority. The Department finds this number necessary for consuls and ministers abroad.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY A. BRIGHAM.

The SPEAKER stated the question in order to be the consideration of Senate bill No. 212, for the relief of Henry A. Brigham, pending last Saturday on the expiration of the morning hour, on which the previous question had been demanded.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that the previous question will not be seconded until we can have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I read very carefully the report on that subject as well as the debate which took place in the other end of the Capitol, and I ask attention to this very singular fact. The whole case turns upon what is the delivery of money. The pay agent went to the desk of the counting-room where he was to receive his money, and the party who was to deliver it laid it in a tray, package by package, and scored it off. When it was laid down he passed it over and told the pay agent to look to see that it was right. On counting it over that time $2,000 was found to be gone. Was that a delivery of money? That is the proposition before the House. This bill goes upon the supposition that it was a delivery, this party receiving the money on the outside of the counter and before he had accepted it as a delivery. It is now declared that it was a delivery.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the teller of the bank is the man who ought to ask for relief; that the bank ought to suffer the loss and not this party.

Mr. HALE. It is not pretended that the money was delivered to or received by the paymaster. The ground of relief is that he gave his check and they refused to return it to him. They hold the paymaster's check for $2,000, when he received no consideration for it; and the Government has charged him with $2,000, from which this bill proposes to relieve him.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to correct the gentleman. If he has read the report carefully he knows that the teller stated, "I have counted the money out to you," and the paymaster replied, "I have not received the money." The teller responded, "According to the rules of this bank I have delivered this money to you."

Mr. HALE. It is not a bank.

Mr. GARFIELD. I use the word bank in a generic sense. They agreed that they would go before Mr. Cisco, the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York. They did go to Mr. Cisco, and he declared that it was a delivery of money by the teller. According to that, if I go to a bank with a check for $100, and the teller takes it, handing me only seventy dollars, that is a delivery and I will have to lose so much money.

Mr. HALE. That is what Mr. Cisco has done in this case. His teller handed the paymaster the money $2,000 short and took his check. It is to relieve the paymaster from a charge that is manifestly unjust that this bill is brought in.

Mr. ARNOLD. Who has the money?

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not make any difference who has received the money. The Assistant Treasurer of the United States should be responsible for it.

Mr. HALE. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have the floor. I think that we should charge the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York with this $2,000, and I understand that the bill before the House does not do that, but relieves all parties and lets the Government be the loser. The bill should be amended so as to make the Assistant Treasurer responsible for this money.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why should the Government be held responsible in a dispute between a paymaster and a teller?

Mr. HALE. For the very reason that this man never received the money that the Government claimed that he did, and because the Government keeps his check for $2,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. If we pass this bill we simply relieve the pay agent, and the Government will lose the $2,000, the Assistant Treasurer being straight in his account. There is no testimony that the money was stolen, notwithstanding the report states that a stranger was there and put his hand on some postage currency, for that does not relieve the case, as it was not postage currency that was missing. It was $2,000 in bills, and not postage currency, which was lost. So there is not the slightest evidence before the House that the money was stolen. It seems to me perfectly evident that the money was improperly counted in the first place inside the bank, and that the Assistant Treasurer in New York should be responsible for it.

Mr. HALE. I believe it is understood or supposed that the clerk himself is to blame; and I am informed, though it does not appear from the evidence in the case, that the clerk was discharged soon after upon an allegation that in some way or manner he had kept the money or miscounted it, or made some mistake. Mr. Cisco, the Assistant Treasurer, was not at all to blame. He decided that the paymaster was responsible for the loss of the money; but it is not alleged that he received the money or had it in his possession at all.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to know whether, if we pass this bill, the Treasury of the United States will not lose $2,000.

Mr. HALE. I do not believe a cent would be lost to the Treasury. I have no doubt that there was a mistake, and that the money was never counted out at all.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. But will not the Government lose it?

Mr. HALE. No, sir; I think a mistake of $2,000 was made, and that the Government never delivered the money to the paymaster, but took his check for $2,000 more than they paid to him.

Mr. KERNAN. We are not relieving anybody by the passage of this bill from accounting for this money; we simply relieve this gentleman to whom the money was never paid, and leave others to account for it as they can. We simply relieve him from a liability of $2,000 for which the Government holds his voucher, when it is conceded by everybody who has looked into the evidence that he never had the money. The Government simply hold his voucher arbitrarily, and every lawyer will concede that had it been a bank he could have sued the bank for $2,000. He could not sue the Government, and we simply ask to exempt him from responsibility, he being free from blame. I trust the bill will pass.

Mr. HALE. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that for a moment, to allow me to make an explanation.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to set myself right in reference to this case. I stated a short time ago, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that I was in favor of the passage of this claim. I thought it was another claim which had been before the Military Committee. I am not committed to this claim.

Mr. HALE. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 37, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. So the bill was passed.

During the call,

Mr. SHANNON stated that Mr. BEAMAN was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. PENDLETON stated that Mr. WARD was detained at his room by indisposition.

Mr. WEBSTER moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHRISTIAN CHANEY.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Christian Chaney; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Christian Chaney the sum of $200, to refund him for the same amount of interest-bearing Treasury notes accidentally burned in July, 1864.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That bill contains an appropriation, and I object to its being considered in the House.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw that objection. This is a very meritorious claim.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is not the amount that I object to, but the principle, to which I have objected during the whole of this Congress, and expect to object to as long as I am here.

Mr. THOMAS. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow some brief explanation I think he will not object to the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not object to any explanation, but I do object to the passage of this bill or any other of a similar character. It is establishing a principle which I think Congress ought not to indorse.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not see of what avail an explanation would be unless the gentleman from Illinois would say that in the event of being satisfied the case is a very clear one he will let it pass without objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to do that.

Mr. THOMAS. I will state the nature of the case. It is the case of a soldier in our Army who placed in the hands of his wife, a very poor and needy woman, at Hagerstown, some two hundred dollars of his pay, saved from his hard earnings. This woman, acting under the advice of her friends in Hagerstown, invested the money, with the consent of her husband, in two $100 interest-paying Treasury notes. They were in her custody personally when Lee's army made its appearance at Hagerstown in July, 1864. In the hurry of the moment she supposed that the safest place in which to deposit the funds would be in a stove-pipe. She placed them in the pipe of a stove in which there had not been a fire for a long time, it being in the summer season, and went into the garden to collect some clothing that she had been engaged in washing for persons in the vicinity. Unfortunately her daughter, fourteen years old, who was out at service, came home in a hurry, and seeing her mother thus engaged, without exchanging a word with the mother, concluded that the clothing was being gathered in for the purpose of being ironed, and stepping to the stove made a fire and consumed this money.

Now, this is clearly proved by incontestable testimony, and I will simply remark to the gentleman from Illinois that a postponement of this case for twelve months, involving a loss of twelve dollars out of the earnings of a soldier in the field, would be very hard upon this necessitous woman. That is all I have to say.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill will have to go to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HALE. If there is no objection I will withdraw the report.

No objection was made, and the report was withdrawn.

JOHN WELLS AND SONS.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Messrs. John Wells & Sons; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes and directs the Quartermaster General, in settling with Messrs. John Wells & Sons for repairs to the steamer City of Albany, under their contract of the 24th of October, 1863, to remit the penalty of $200 per day contained in said contract, and to pay them for their work under said contract without any deduction on account of said penalties.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the joint resolution be considered now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will either explain the joint resolution or have the report read.

Mr. HALE. Certainly; I will make a statement to the House unless the gentleman wishes to have the report read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want to have the report read. I think the gentleman had better let the joint resolution be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and printed with the report.

Mr. HALE. I will state the particulars of the case, and then the gentleman can do as he pleases.

These men were contractors for repairing the machinery upon the steamboat City of Albany. They were to receive $10,800, and the work was to be done by the 10th of January, 1864. In default of its being done by that time they were to pay $200 a day to the Government for every day lost before the work was finished. They immediately commenced work. But some of the heavy machinery they were unable to make themselves, and for the construction of this they contracted with one of the most extensive establishments in New York. In consequence of a strike in that establishment the cylinders and other heavy machinery could not be furnished within the specified time. The contractors, however, proceeded with all possible diligence, and finished the work as soon as it was possible for them to get the machinery. The work was finished to the entire satisfaction of the Government. Indeed, the evidence shows that the work was better done than the contract called for. Under these circumstances the contractors applied to the Quartermaster General for a remission of the penalty. He decided that he could not remit the penalty; that relief must be sought from Congress.

The Committee of Claims, in considering the case, were led to the conclusion that where a contractor performs his part of the contract faithfully and honestly, and delay arises from circumstances which he cannot possibly control, it is unreasonable and unjust to insist upon the enforcement of the penalty. The penalty in this case would cover nearly the whole amount of the work. The contractors are men of small means. The contract amounted to about ten thousand dollars. The work was honestly and faithfully performed, and performed just as soon as it was possible for them to do it. There was no delay or neglect on their part; it is not alleged that there was any. Under these circumstances, the Committee of Claims, in accordance, as I understand, with the request of the Quartermaster General, and his opinion of the justice of the claim, recommend that payment should be made according to the terms of the contract, without deducting the amount of the penalty.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to demand the reading of the report. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HALE] is entitled to the floor, and the report cannot be read unless he yields for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. I am perfectly willing that the report shall be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose that I am entitled to have it read at some time.

The SPEAKER. Not unless the gentleman [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois] is on the floor, and the reading of the report comes out of his time. At present, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the Speaker decide that a member has not a right to demand the reading of any report or paper?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has consulted on the point, and decides according to his own opinion, and according to the opinion of others, better parliamentarians than himself. When the House is in Committee of the Whole on objection day, a gentleman demands the reading of a report because he claims the right to object unless he hears the report read, and the report is read to satisfy his mind. But when a bill, public or private, is before the House, the gentleman in possession of the floor has a right to demand a vote on the question.

Mr. A. MYERS. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. HALE] a question. I understand him to state that the contract has been substantially complied with.

Mr. HALE. Very faithfully and honestly complied with.

Mr. A. MYERS. Has the Government sustained any damage by the delay?

Mr. HALE. Not at all, so far as I know. The Government, according to the admission of its own officers, has received an equivalent for the full contract price. The work has been fully as well done as it was contracted to be done. I call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question and let the House hear the report of the committee. I think it a most extraordinary thing if the House cannot be advised as to the contents of a report on which they are called upon to act.

Mr. HALE. I am perfectly willing that the report shall be read if I do not thereby lose the right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor, and the report will be read as a part of his speech.

The report was read.

Mr. HALE. The report bears out all the statements I made. I demand the previous question and submit the case to the justice of the House. If they think that the Government ought to exact this penalty under the circumstances they will refuse to pass the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 8; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and HALE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 10.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMISTEAD T. M. FILLER.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a joint resolution to refer the claim of Armistead T. M. Filler to the Court of Claims, which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will give some reason for referring all these matters to the Court of Claims. I have no idea that the House will not sustain it, but I would like to have it upon record why we are putting this jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims. If this goes, every like case will go to that court.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, it will be recollected that at the last session we conferred upon the Quartermaster General and the Commissary General the power to settle all claims for property destroyed by our Army where no vouchers were given. They were allowed to examine the evidence, and, if they were satisfied that the property was taken from loyal citizens in the loyal States, to settle the claims. This is one of the same kind of claims, the only difference being that this man lives in Loudoun county, Virginia. It has been proved to the satisfaction of the committee that this claimant is a loyal man. His case does not come within the provisions of the general law, and he has, therefore, to go to the Court of Claims. It is the only place where this man can have his claim adjusted.

Under the circumstances the committee thought that this was a fair case to be referred to the Court of Claims. If this man lived in Maryland, he would not have to ask for this resolution; but as he lives upon the other side of the Potomac he has to ask for this legislation. I do not believe that it is for this Government to refuse to this man an opportunity to have his claim considered. The Commissary General cannot consider it, the Quartermaster General cannot consider it, and the Court of Claims cannot consider it. This legislation is necessary for the reference of the claim to the Court of Claims. If it is right, they will pass it; if not, they will reject it. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand this to be a case that does not come within the provisions of the general law passed by Congress, because this man lives in one of the rebel States; and if it be passed we will have a shoal of like claims. Relief ought to be granted in Congress, and not in the Court of Claims.

Mr. HALE. If we do not pass this resolution this man will lose his property, and never get a cent for it. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 40; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. SCHENCK and THOMAS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the resolution be laid on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 60, nays 70, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ashley, Baxter, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Elliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Gooch, Harding, Higb., Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Rollins, Scott, Sloan, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Chilton A. White, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—52.

So the joint resolution was not laid on the table.

During the call,

Mr. WILSON stated that his colleague, Mr. GRINNELL, was still detained from the House on account of sickness.

Mr. BAXTER stated that Mr. ORTH was detained in his room by sickness.

The result was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. HALE. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was pending, on which no quorum voted. The morning hour has expired.

GUANO DISCOVERIES.

Mr. L. MYERS obtained the floor, but yielded to—

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, who asked and obtained unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act entitled "An act to authorize protection to be given to citizens of the United States who may discover deposits of guano," approved August 18, 1856, as prohibits the export thereof by certain persons referred to in the second section of said act.

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS IN MICHIGAN, ETC.

Mr. L. MYERS. I call up the privileged motion I made a day or two since, to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected the bill of the House (No. 710) to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads, to which land grants have been made, in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin; and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. ANCONA. I move to lay that motion on the table; and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to postpone the bill until we get through with the tax bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has moved the previous question, and the gentleman on the right has moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, upon which he has called the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 48, nays 70, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, Clay, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Eckley, Edgerton, English, Finck, Gooch, Grider, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, William Johnson, Kallfleisch, King, Mallory, Marcy, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Radford, Edward H. NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, William G. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Chilton A. White, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—64.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

During the call, Mr. COBB stated that upon this question he was paired off with Mr. McINDOE.

Mr. L. MYERS. I called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. On the motion to reconsider I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that we take a vote only on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I want them on both.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill,

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 44, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, William G. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eden,

So the bill was passed.

TAX BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask that when we go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the debate on the proposition to impose a tax on sales be limited to fifteen minutes for each speech instead of five minutes.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORRILL. I object; five minutes is enough.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRILL's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 744, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be upon the amendment offered last evening by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL:] which is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause in the fourth section, as follows: "That in addition to the duties imposed in section ninety-four of the act to which this is an amendment, as heretofore amended, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, upon the goods, wares, and merchandise therein mentioned, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, an increase of one fifth or twenty per cent. of the duties or rates of duty now provided in said section, whether ad valorem or specific: Provided, That the additional duties or rates of duty herein mentioned shall not apply to coal illuminating oil, refined, and naphtha, benzine and benzole, paper of all descriptions, printed books, magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and similar publications, cotton, manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots;" and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

That all persons licensed under the provisions of this act or of the act to which this is an amendment, and who are engaged in the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, or of articles produced or manufactured, whether foreign or domestic, shall, within ten days after the 1st day of each and every month, make return, under oath or affirmation, of the amount of goods, wares, and merchandise or articles sold during the month preceding, and shall pay thereon a tax of one half of one per cent., and all such persons in the assessment and collection of the tax imposed by this section shall be subject to the provisions of law relating to the assessment and collection of taxes of manufacturers, mentioned in the eighty-second section of the act to which this is an amendment, as far as the same are applicable.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I desire to ask if it would be in order to offer an amendment substituting one per cent. for the half of one per cent., and offering this amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts then as a substitute for the clause providing for an income tax?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Would it be in order to move to strike out all in relation to the income tax?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order. That is not in the pending paragraph. The pending paragraph is in regard to sales exclusively.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Then I move to strike out "half of one per cent." and insert "one per cent."

I should be glad if the Committee of Ways and Means had either had time or had felt that it was the true policy for them to have considered more fully, perhaps, than they have had an opportunity of doing, this question of substituting a tax upon sales in place of the income tax, for I am persuaded that if time were given those gentlemen to consider it they would arrive at the conclusion, which I think most practical men who have thought on this subject have arrived at, that some such mode of indirect taxation must be resorted to in order to collect the necessary revenue for the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit to the Committee of Ways and Means so far as the income tax is concerned, that there is no mode of taxation that is more unjust and unequal or that is subject to greater frauds or more susceptible of evasion than the income tax; and if a plan could be substituted for it by which indirectly a far greater amount could be raised, as it could be by the imposition of a tax upon sales, I am satisfied that it would bear more lightly upon the people and secure, with still greater certainty, a far larger revenue.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the policy adopted and recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means is to a very great degree oppressive. As an illustration, take, for instance, the duty on manufactures; I can see no reason why the manufacturer of an article should be heavily taxed for its production, while the man who sells that very article should be exempt from taxation. I can see no good reason why the manufacturer, for instance, who manufactures $100,000 worth per annum should be taxed his $5,000, while the man living on the very same block, who sells that very same commodity, and perhaps secures a far greater profit, shall be exempt from any taxation except a mere license limited to $100.

Now, I desire to say in connection with this subject that I hope that either at the present session or at some future time, either the present or some future Committee of Ways and Means will see fit to consider this subject fairly, and to devise some mode of raising revenue by indirection rather than by this oppressive mode of direct taxation.

Mr. MORRILL. I can inform the gentleman from New York that this question in relation to the income tax and a tax on sales has been often and long considered by the Committee of Ways and Means. It is by no means a new question to the Committee of Ways and Means.

I said in the few remarks which I made upon the general question of taxation upon presenting this bill that if the policy were to become the permanent policy of the country I believed that the more just mode of arriving at an income tax would be to levy it upon the amount of property held by every person; but not believing that it will be a part of the permanent policy of the country I think it better to go on collecting it as we are now collecting it, upon profits, which have been rather large during the last year or two, rather than make any radical change at this session.

But this question of a tax on sales is by no means a new question. It was considered by Adam Smith, and denounced by him. If the gentleman is conversant with works on political economy he knows the opinions of that eminent writer. Let me read the language of Adam Smith:

"The famous alcavala of Spain seems to have been established upon this principle. It was at first a tax of ten per cent., afterward of fourteen per cent., and it is at present only six per cent. upon the sale of every sort of property, whether movable or immovable; and it is repeated every time the property is sold." (Mémoires concernant les Droits, &c., tome I, p. 455.) "The levying of this tax requires a multitude of revenue officers, sufficient to guard the transportation of goods not only from one province to another, but from one shop to another. It subjects not only the dealers in some sorts of goods, but those in all sorts, every farmer, every manufacturer, every merchant and shop-keeper, to the continual visit and examination of the tax gatherers. Through the greater part of the country in which a tax of this kind is established nothing can be produced for distant sale. The produce of every part of the country must be proportioned to the consumption of the neighborhood. It is to the alcavala, accordingly, that Ustaritz imputes the ruin of the manufactures of Spain."

A writer in the Social Science Review for January, 1865, says:

"The imposition of this tax in Spain and Naples could not have been so burdensome as it proved in Holland, for the latter was a country supported by intense commercial activity, where the national prosperity depended upon the freedom of its internal and foreign intercourse. It is in such countries—and the United States is such a country—that a tax of this nature proves most unbearable. The rigor with which it bore upon the Dutch is proved from the fact that, while they were patient under Alva's revengeful cruelties and religious persecutions, the moment he laid the alcavala, or, as it was called in Holland, the tenth denier, upon them, they revolted, and their revolt finally secured the independence of the Dutch provinces, and led to the establishment of the greatest republic which had ever existed since the days of Rome. It is related that at the siege of Haarlem the Dutch insurgents, enraged at the cruelty of the besiegers, beheaded eleven of their Spanish prisoners, and with grim facetiousness threw their heads over the walls into the camp of the Spaniards, with this note: "Duke of Alva, thou hast demanded a tenth from the town of Haarlem. Here is the sum, with an extra head for the interest."

Motley, one of the most distinguished of our recent historians, in his Rise of the Dutch Republic, characterized this tax as "monstrous," "fatal to all trade and manufactures," "productive of an entire prostration of industry."

If we impose this tax upon sales it will become the most odious tax ever levied in this country. No complaints that have been made with regard to all the other taxes will compare with the complaints which this tax will excite.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts by striking out "one half of one per cent.," and I do so for the purpose of presenting a few suggestions to the House in reference to this subject of taxation upon sales. In my judgment, it is but another mode of imposing the entire burden of taxation upon the consumers of this country. The proposition just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRISWOLD] to abandon the taxation upon incomes and substitute a tax upon sales is but another mode of exempting the great body of the capital of this country from any burden of taxation whatever.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I merely suggested that.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Then, if the gentleman does not insist upon it, I go to another point.

If we impose a tax upon sales, upon whom will the burden of this taxation fall? It will fall upon the consumers of this country, who are, as a general thing, the poorer class. It may be said that all taxes fall upon them. They are relieved somewhat by our present system of taxing incomes; and that is almost the only instance in which our taxation does not fall entirely upon the consumers of the country. A tax upon sales would but impose another burden upon this class. You tax the sales of the manufacturer; then you tax the merchant when he sells to his western customer; and when that western dealer sells to his customers these different taxes are all summed up, and constitute a part of the price which poor men, with families to feed and clothe, are obliged to pay for the articles which they need. Thus, in the end, they are made to bear the burden.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to ask the gentleman a question; upon whom should the burden of carrying on the war fall?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. The burden of carrying on the war should fall chiefly upon that class of the community who have the greatest interest in maintaining our Government, and they are the men who wield and control the capital of this country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Have the capitalists the greatest interest in maintaining the Government?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. They have a more direct pecuniary interest in maintaining the Government than have the great masses, because they have more to protect. The principal part of the burden of supporting the Government should fall upon those who have most to protect and are best able to bear this burden.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. He maintains that if a tax be laid upon sales the burden will fall upon the consumer. Now, does not a tax upon manufactures fall indirectly upon the consumer, because the manufacturer must supply the consumer?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Of course it does. But if we tax the merchant upon his sales this tax is added to the burdens already borne by the consumer. The widow of the soldier, when she goes to buy the necessities of life for her family, pays a portion of that burden. The merchant and the manufacturer do not feel the tax, because under our system they are able to add it to their sales.

Hence I oppose the system. I am in favor of increasing the burdens of taxation upon the capital of the country. I would rather vote for an increase of the tax upon incomes than to diminish it, for it is the only mode by which we can make the taxes bear equally. Where we resort to the tax upon incomes we do to some extent relieve the consumers of the country, who are poor, from the burdens of taxation, and make them fall upon those who hold the wealth of the country in their hands.

I am therefore opposed, I repeat, to any tax upon sales whatever. The practical working of the system of taxation upon sales would be to compel the merchants of the country to buy their goods at first hands.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The gentleman will allow me to ask him another question. Is there any more justice in imposing a direct tax upon the manufacturer of $100,000 of goods, wares, and merchandise, who perhaps makes no profit upon the manufacture, than upon the man who sells that amount and makes a large profit? Is there any more justice in imposing a direct tax upon one than upon another?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. No more justice; but by this system of taxation you make the consumer in the end pay the tax. The manufacturer is protected by the tariff. No, sir; there would be no justice in either event, according to the gentleman's showing. I oppose the tax upon sales because it imposes an additional burden upon the great consuming classes of the community. I am endeavoring to combat the position of the gentleman from New York, that we ought to abandon the tax upon incomes and resort to some other mode of taxation.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think that the committee will see that every tax we impose, unless it be the income tax, and I am not sure about that, is a tax on consumers. We might as well admit the fact. The tax which is levied by Congress upon the manufacturers, and which the Committee of Ways and Means now propose to increase, is a tax upon consumers. The only distinction which can be made is that the income tax is a tax upon the producers; but in this country the class of producers is almost the same as the class of consumers. And finally, when you come to analyze this system of taxation, whether on incomes, on manufactures, or on sales, the result is the same, the producers and consumers of the country pay the tax; and the only difference there is, and in that difference I find some advantage in the tax upon manufactures and on sales over the income tax, is that the consumers in this country are a larger class than the producers.

If it were possible, I think that the larger portion of the pecuniary burdens of this war should be upon property, and not upon labor and laborers, for wherever you find a man poor you find a man able to defend himself; but it is property, in and of itself, which is indefensible, and relies upon man for protection.

The advantage of the system in this section is simply this, not that it exempts the consumers, not that it exempts the producers, and it is no more offensive and objectionable than the tax upon manufactures, but it is in this: that it touches larger transactions because it levies a tax upon all convertible and exchangeable merchandise in the country, while the tax upon manufactures levies it only upon a portion, that which relates to manufactures of domestic production. This tax upon sales includes foreign products imported into the country. It enables us to tax these articles in being transferred from one to another without affecting at all the tariff system of the country. Therefore there is an advantage in this system.

Then, again, we deal with business men—those who are licensed as manufacturers or dealers of some sort—and every man whose sales come up to $1,000 under the law has to pay a license; and as a business man he arranges his business with reference to the tax, and governs himself at the end of the month by it when he renders his return. He pays his tax without complaint, because his business is based upon the expectation that he has to pay the tax; and I believe that it will be found the most easy of all the various modes of taxation in the method of assessing and collecting the tax. It will yield a large revenue. It will furnish means which the Government needs. I have not time in this five minutes to show why, if this war is to cease in the next six months, we ought to have large revenues for the purpose of liquidating the floating debt of the country without funding it. If a portion of the public debt which has not been funded can, with a large revenue, be paid as the war draws to a close, it will be a relief to the country in this particular, that it will be paid in a currency which represents in some degree the value of the property which the Government received, founded upon estimates based upon a depreciated currency. Therefore, if the war is to come to a close, so much more do we need large revenues for a year or two in order that the floating debt of the country may be liquidated.

Nor am I alarmed at the suggestions drawn from the history of Spain. The gentleman from Vermont should understand that that was a tax which affected not sales so much as the manufacturing industry of the country; and if any argument were to be drawn from the experience of that effete and worn-out people, it would go to show that the tax upon manufactures, which the gentleman from Vermont proposes to increase, ought not to be levied, because that was a tax upon the manufactured articles, and affected materially that branch of industry in that country.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN withdrew his amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew it, in order to notice the remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Before doing that, I will say that it seems immaterial whether this tax falls on the producer or the consumer, or on any particular class of society. The question is not on whom it falls so much as where its weight will strike the industry of the country. It is quite material to me, if I have to carry a weight of ten pounds, whether it is laid upon my shoulders or fastened to my ankles; and that illustrates the relative nature of these two systems of taxation. A tax on sales is a burden fastened to the ankles of the nation, while taxes of other kinds are burdens laid upon its shoulders, which it can bear without exhaustion.

No one, I believe, will controvert the position that a tax on sales is in reality a tax on the commodity sold. Is it the policy of this House to tax all commodities without discrimination? Do we propose to tax lands? Do we propose to tax beef, pork, wheat, and corn? A tax on sales is a tax on all the necessities of life. A tax on sales is a tax on everything which is sold under the license law, as regulated by the ninety-second section of the revenue law of last session. And if any gentleman here thinks it unwise to tax the necessities of life he must think it unwise to tax sales which reach all these necessities. It is therefore a grave objection to this mode of taxation that it does not discriminate between those commodities which should be free and those which ought to bear the public burden.

Another thing: the gentleman from Massachusetts has given what he regards the strong argument in favor of this mode, namely, that it is an easy method of collecting the tax. It puts property in a place where the Government can lay hands upon it in bulk. To my mind, sir, that is one of the great dangers of this tax. It is precisely similar to the method of procuring a loan by issuing legal-tender notes. It is so easy a thing to do that we are constantly in danger of inflating the currency; a tax on sales is so easily authorized that it only requires a dash of the pen to run it up from one half per cent. to ten per cent., as they had it in Spain. What the greenback currency is to loans, a tax on sales is to the general revenue. There is our danger.

I refer again to the teachings of history on this subject. I have this morning looked over the parliamentary debates of Great Britain for the last thirty years. During that period there were three revisions of the whole system of British taxation. The discussion in Parliament on one of those occasions, (1842,) as reported in Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, runs through five volumes, and is very full. But in all those debates no member of either House of Parliament proposed such a thing as a tax on sales. So completely is it understood in that country—that country which, perhaps, is better educated upon the subject of taxation than any other—that no gentleman in the Parliament of England had the temerity to propose a tax on sales.

But it is proposed here this morning to do a thing which no civilized nation is now doing, which was never done but by three nations, and resulted disastrously in each case. The attempt to introduce it into Holland caused the wars of Alva, and originated the Dutch Republic. How was it in Spain, and in Naples? Some of the subdivisions in each of those countries sought and obtained permission to commute the tax on sales by raising the same amount in other modes, not so injurious to the interests of industry. The districts that obtained the privilege of commutation paid their taxes, and were able to bear it, while the provinces that paid the tax on sales fell to decay, when all other conditions of growth were equal. Of this tax Prescott says:

“Whatever may be thought of its legality, there can be no doubt it was one of the most successful means ever devised by a Government for shackling the industry and enterprise of its subjects.”—Note to Ferdinand and Isabella, vol. 3, p. 488.

I call attention to the intrinsic injustice of this measure. A just tax is one in which the citizen shares his prosperity with the Government. But a sale is by no means a mark of prosperity. It is often a serious compulsory sacrifice, in which case this law taxes the loss of the citizen. To tax misfortune is not merely injustice, it is cruelty. I hope the ingenuity of the Committee or Ways and Means will show us a more excellent way for sustaining the expenses of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] has said nearly all that I wished to say on this subject. I endorse what he has said. But there was one remark made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to which I wish to pay some little attention. The gentleman from Massachusetts acknowledges that the tax imposed upon manufactures is now paid by the consumer, and must continue to be the case. I concur with him in that opinion. But I wish to suggest to those gentlemen who wish to relieve the consumers from the payment of this tax and to impose it to some extent upon the manufacturers, that after this bill shall be completed, and when the tariff bill comes up, we may attain that end. I am opposed to burdening the consumers with the whole tax laid upon manufactured articles; and yet they will be burdened with that tax so long as we permit the ruling power in this House so to shape the tariff as to prevent the articles that come into competition with domestic manufactures coming to market. When we abandon our protective policy, and lower the duty so as to allow foreign articles to come into competition with home manufactures, then we can make the manufacturer pay the tax, and relieve the consumer. In order to do that, I hope that when the time will come gentlemen will help me in an effort to relieve the consumers and make the manufacturers pay the tax.

Mr. GARFIELD withdrew his amendment.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not extend to sales made by manufacturers or producers of the articles, goods, wares, and merchandise sold.

I do not understand, sir, that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is to substitute the proposition which he has advanced for the fourth section of the bill now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It is to follow that section.

Mr. THAYER. It is to follow, as I understand, that section, and is to constitute a new and substantive section itself. The fourth section contemplates an additional duty of twenty per cent. on sales made by manufacturers to the already heavy taxation imposed by the original act. If we are to adopt the fourth section it would certainly be most impolitic for us to levy this additional tax on such sales as are made by manufacturers; in other words, to add to the burdens already imposed on the manufacturing interest this further twenty per cent. contemplated by the bill and the burden proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether it would not simplify the method and avoid embarrassments if, instead of putting twenty per cent. additional on manufactures as proposed by the bill, we should put on only ten per cent? It would then leave the burden identically where it is, and avoid some complications by reason of the proposed exemption. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania understand that?

Mr. THAYER. I cannot act upon the theory of some proposed action which I do not know will take place. I do know that there is now before this committee no proposition to strike out this fourth section. I do not know that the committee of Ways and Means have abandoned this fourth section for the one proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] If this fourth section is left in the law, it would be manifestly absurd, in my opinion, to inflict a further tax upon sales made by manufacturers, after adding twenty per cent. to the already heavy taxation imposed upon that interest.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER], as well as the original proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] It seems to me that this is not only a tax upon consumption, but it is also a tax upon a very large class of the products of this country that cannot afford to bear the burden of such a tax, particularly the articles of wheat and flour, which are the great staple products of the western States. It is well known, and cannot be denied, that the price of flour in Liverpool tends largely to regulate the price of wheat and flour in this country, and if there is a tax upon the sales of those articles it will be a tax upon the producers of those articles in the States where they are produced, as they cannot add the tax to the price of the article; and not only that, but every single transfer of wheat and flour from the West to the East will result in a tax not only of the half per cent. here proposed, but there will also be from one half to one per cent. imposed in the way of profit, and it will be equivalent to levying a tax of from eight to ten per cent. upon the producers of wheat and flour particularly, for every barrel of flour that passes from the West to the East passes through the hands of from eight to ten persons from the farmer who produces it in the shape of wheat before it reaches the consumer; and if, as has been suggested to me, you exempt wheat and flour from the operation of this tax, you would really exempt the great basis of the internal commerce of this country.

But although in favor of vigorous measures of taxation, I am opposed to any check upon that commerce. If we undertake to impose a tax upon those articles, we would destroy or greatly impair the production of those articles, and would, in addition, destroy the great class of middlemen who deal in these articles between the Mississippi river and the Atlantic sea-board. I am not surprised that gentlemen representing constituencies in New York and other great cities in the eastern States are in favor of this tax upon sales, because the necessary tendency of such a tax will be to consolidate trade in those large cities and break down the smaller traders throughout the country.

Last night we refused to impose a tax of more than five per cent. upon cotton, an article produced with great profit to the planter, and although that article of production is more than any other transferred directly to the consumer abroad from the producer here. Yet by imposing a tax of one half of one per cent. upon sales you really impose a tax of from eight to ten cents upon every bushel of wheat raised in the western States, upon which there is at best but a small profit to the producer. It will not only check commerce, but tend to destroy one great interest in this country, the interest of agriculture, and it will also tend to destroy the interest of manufacture, as in the case of the “alcavala” in Spain. There not only the manufacturing interests were destroyed, but the agricultural interests of that country were also almost wholly destroyed; and in the case of Naples, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has truly said, the tax became so odious that the people of towns and districts there undertook by compositions of that tax to get rid of it.

I am upon principle opposed to this tax, because I believe it would be a radical change in our system of raising revenue, and would require the presence of the tax gatherer and collector in every district and hamlet in the country. I think this proposition ought not to be adopted, because it will act injuriously upon all the great western States, and also upon the eastern States, outside of the cities.

The amendment of Mr. THAYER was rejected.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move to amend by striking out the last line of the pending amendment. It is obvious that this is a proposition either to tax classes or to tax consumption; it is one of the two. If it be a proposition to tax consumption, as argued by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN], I am surprised that the West should complain of that mode of taxation, because consumption prevails where the population prevails, and it is in proportion to the population, and therefore it is that the eastern States, principally the large cities of the eastern States, would pay the larger proportion of this tax.

Now, sir, in my judgment this is not a tax upon consumption, but it is a tax upon trade. There are three classes in our community: the producing class, the trading class, and the professional class. They are all consumers. This is a proposition to tax the trading classes, a tax on sales. Capital can always take care of itself, and it has almost become the rule in this country that those who produce everything get nothing, and those who produce nothing get everything. The trading class as a class are a useful and respectable portion of the body-politic, but they are not producing classes. They produce nothing. They create nothing; but by their brains and wit, and if you please, by their energy and perseverance, they avail themselves of the productions of others, and live and make money by it.

Now, this amendment proposes, as I understand it, to levy a tax upon sales. If you tax sales it does not necessarily follow that the tax imposed runs into the consumption of the article, and the consumer finally pays it. Therefore, I can see no objection to this mode of taxation; and I am a little surprised that that portion of our country where population is sparse and where consumption is necessarily not so great as it is in the Atlantic States should take exception to this mode of taxation, provided the taxation is really imposed. Whether considered as a tax on trade or consumption, (it is one or the other,) it seems to me that that portion of the country represented by the Atlantic States must pay the greater part of it; hence the West should not complain.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, it is essential to us, as every one must admit, to raise revenue. All taxes are burdensome; but taxation is now inevitable, and the question which we are to consider is what is that mode of taxation which shall rest most uniformly and equitably upon the varied interests of this country? and, in my judgment, there is no way of imposing taxation which is so just and so equitable as this upon sales. I know that it may affect manufacturers, producers, and consumers, but that we cannot avoid. We must have money or else we must let this Government go; and, sir, for one, I stand ready to tax every interest in this country rather than surrender the Government, and if it takes half per cent. or five per cent. on sales and ten per cent. or fifty per cent. on incomes, I am ready to vote the tax if only, in my judgment, it shall be necessary to sustain the Government.

It is alleged here that this tax is oppressive upon peculiar interests, upon the middlemen, upon the small dealers scattered throughout the western country. I undertake to say, from some little personal knowledge on the subject, that you may start from the city of New York, from the wholesale dealer there, and go to the purchasers from him in Albany, Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, and so to various points even beyond the Mississippi river, and you will find that the profit made by the retailer in each instance as you go further West is greater than the profit made by the wholesale dealer who supplies the traders with the goods. I know that in the State of Iowa the profits of the retailer there are greater than the profits either of the wholesale dealer or the retailers in the States of New York and Ohio, and it is immaterial to what class of goods you apply that proposition. I say, therefore, that it is just and right that this tax, which reaches every interest, should be imposed.

For myself I am interested largely in the production and sale of coal in this country, and I say, "Come on with your taxes and I will try to take care of my interests and to pay my proportion." I hope that every interest in this country will respond in a similar spirit, and that gentlemen upon this floor will not be afraid of taxation because it may be unpopular, but will support it because taxation is a necessity.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HULBURD. I move to strike out the last three lines of the amendment. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the historical instances cited here are not altogether relevant, certainly not conclusive. The cases cited by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] as well as those read by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] indicate that the percentage was ten per cent. in Naples and fourteen per cent. in Spain and the Netherlands.

The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is to impose a tax of one half of one per cent. If it were proposed to make this a tax of ten per cent., that would certainly tie up property, or, as has been said, prevent its mobility. But this is a very small per centum. It is very well known that in New York and in Chicago property in its exchange is burdened with a commission of two and a half per cent. Yet who ever heard that that prevented the transfer of property? Who ever heard that, because there is a broker's commission in New York, therefore property is tied up? This objection has no relevancy, because the percentage here proposed is so small that it will not be directly felt.

The gentleman says that the adoption of this proposition will break up the middleman. Well, sir, he has learned, and so have I, that the nearer the producer and the consumer come together the better it is for the consumer. If business men generally desire this change, why not try the experiment? Sir, within the last three weeks I heard one of the largest operatives in the city of New York, the man who pays a heavier income tax than any other man in the United States, say that if such a proposition as this should become a law, he would lift up both his hands in favor of it. It will be said, of course, that he will add this per centum to the price of his goods. Very well. The jobber will put it upon his; the retailer will put it upon his. And if it be true, as has been said here, and to a certain extent it is true, that the people desire taxation, they desire it because they are earnest in their determination that this war shall be carried on and the rebellion put down; and as they are freely pouring out their blood they will not spare the money that may be required; and why shall they not contribute their money in this indirect way?

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I have made up my mind to support this proposition to tax sales. But I must observe that, if I believed my colleague from Ohio, or my respected friend from Iowa, to be correct, I should hesitate before giving my vote for this proposition. But, sir, I have no idea that a tax upon sales is to operate as a ball and chain upon the ankle of industry. On the contrary I maintain that the weight of that ball and chain would rest upon the rich and those who are plethoric with money. There can be no question of that.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. What is it that regulates the price of wheat and flour in this country?

Mr. SPALDING. I will answer the gentleman presently.

If, sir, the producers of wheat and corn should be obliged to pay their proportion of the taxation of this country, I, as a representative of that class, would not complain; for they are now as lightly taxed as any class of the community. Our farmers, who are making money out of the produce of their lands, are the least taxed of any of the producing classes of the country; and they can well afford to pay something of tax in this direction. They will not feel it.

The bulk of sales made now are made to and from the shoddy contractors, men who have an abundance of money; men who buy houses at extravagant prices; men who buy lands; men who buy silks and satins; men who buy diamonds. The men who deal in these articles of luxury are those who would feel this tax. The ball and chain will rest there, if it rests anywhere.

Now, I say that it is unfair in discussing this question to appeal to the passions of members of the House by saying that the honest and industrious poor of the land will have to pay this tax. The major part of it will rest upon those who can afford it. No doubt it will be felt to some extent in all directions and by all the people; but it will be felt proportionately. Articles of necessity will not feel the tax so essentially as articles of luxury. Consequently those who deal in articles of luxury will bear the greater part of the burden.

I believe that at this time the exigencies of the country are such that in spite of the fine-spun theories found in the books, which are now guiding some of the learned gentlemen on this floor, we must either try this experiment or adopt something that will operate more grievously upon the population of our common country. I am in favor of trying this experiment.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss this question at any length. I always feel a hesitation in giving my views in this House on any question of importance, but I must in this case act according to the best of my judgment, which is decidedly in favor of this tax. The theory which has been advanced, and the extracts which have been read from publications as to the tax upon sales in other countries, I do not think apply to us. We are a different nation from any other. Our whole system of government is different from others. We are a free people—a people who read, write, and think for ourselves.

Again, sir, we have tested this matter of a tax upon the sales ourselves, and it is believed that that mode is better than any other one by any other nation. You will remember that last year we taxed the sales of stocks, bonds, and other securities. At that time there was serious opposition made to it. The Committee of Ways and Means, if I remember correctly, reported a tax of one fiftieth of one per cent. This House after discussion made it one tenth of one per cent. Afterward the conference committee fixed it at one twentieth of one per cent., two and a half times greater than was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. That has been to a certain extent carried into effect. The result was, as we were told last evening by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ODELL,] that a large amount of money had been received into the Treasury from the tax upon these sales.

We were told that it would decrease the business. Instead of decreasing, the business has increased; not because it is taxed, but because the business of the country has not been impeded by this tax upon the sales of bonds and other securities.

I know, and every gentleman of this House understands, that this will be a precedent. Taxation is, and always will be, a precedent. That is accepted. We can by this tax increase the revenue. The bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means cannot, I think, increase the revenue very largely; and I do think that the tax upon sales would add to the revenue of the country largely at this time, when it is so very necessary to us.

I am decidedly in favor of this tax. As I remarked last evening, I think that the people of the country are in favor of it, and willing to sustain us in our action.

Mr. HULBURD, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out one half of one per cent. and insert one quarter of one per cent. If this proposition had come before the House without the heavy tax upon incomes, and with a general increase, it would have obtained my cordial support. But as the gentlemen from the Committee of Ways and Means inform us that they expect to raise from this additional tax now presented from three hundred and fifty to four hundred million dollars, I think it a matter of grave doubt whether at this time, when the country is suffering from the great and necessary burdens for carrying on the war, to attempt to pay off any large portion of our public debt which the gentlemen on the committee propose. To glance a moment at our debt, and estimating it at $2,000,000,000, seven per cent. upon this sum would be $140,000,000 to be raised per annum. The estimate for the coming year is, as I before remarked, three hundred and fifty to four hundred million dollars, so that we have sufficient to not only pay the interest, but provide two to three hundred million dollars toward paying the expenses of the war. If I understand the gentlemen correctly who advocate this measure it is proposed to raise an additional sum of sixty to eighty million dollars. If the section to which this is an amendment is struck out altogether it would appear to me more acceptable. In view, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that we have already taxed very heavily the mercantile interests, I propose that the tax should be reduced to one quarter of one per cent. The experiment would not be of so much consequence if it failed to realize the views of those who promote it, and it would not bear so heavily upon the already heavily taxed manufacturing interests of the country. It has always been a matter of astonishment to the country why persons who happen to have their money invested in land should refuse to pay their just proportion of taxes, and through their Representatives in Congress steadily vote down any measure calculated to reach them; while persons who, after accumulating some property by self-denial and application, investing it in railroad bonds and other securities, should be taxed to such an extent as to be unable since the war begun to scarcely support their families. I know of many cases of the most extreme hardship and positive suffering among a large class of people, while the great landed and farming interest of the country, sufficient to lessen the burdens of the war to an enormous extent, escape. This tax of even one half per cent., if it reaches the farmer, would only involve, in case his crops should realize $2,000, but ten dollars; and I ask whether any farmer in the country is unpatriotic enough to refuse to pay that sum.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. THAYER. I do not understand that the farmer would be obliged to pay anything by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, because it is confined to those who are obliged to take out a license.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It applies to all sales, without reference to licenses.

Mr. THAYER. No, sir.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then it is still more ridiculous that any objection should be made.

Mr. THAYER. It is confined, the gentleman will ascertain, to persons who are obliged to take out a license. I should be more in favor of it if it extended to all classes of persons; because I believe it would be more equal and just.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the following:

Including all sales of stock and bullion by brokers and others, and excluding all sales of agricultural products.

Mr. Chairman, it would seem at first sight that a tax on sales might be an unobjectionable and a productive tax; but an examination of its true character and of the difficulties in assessing and collecting it will, in my opinion, satisfy any one that it is the most objectionable, the most vexatious, and the least productive, in proportion to the cost of collecting it, of all forms of taxation.

Experience has demonstrated that it is far more economical and less vexation to tax more heavily the fewest objects, and at the fewest points where it will bear alike upon the whole community in proportion to their means or annual expenditure, than to tax lightly many objects at a great many points, to be collected in small sums from a great many persons. The correctness of this principle is recognized by many who urge the "tax on sales," and they present it as an argument in its favor. The mistake they make is, that because such a tax is comprehended in the single expression of a "tax on sales," they overlook the important fact that no other tax could be imposed which reaches so many objects of taxation or so many subjects to collect it from.

As an illustration of the principles by which the Committee of Ways and Means have been guided in preparing their tax bills in this and in the preceding Congress, I would refer to the tariff of duties on imports. Before this civil war commenced the revenue of the nation came almost entirely from the duty on imports. The farmers, the mechanics, the producers and manufacturers throughout the country, were exempt from the visits of the national tax gatherers, though every man, woman, and child in the country contributed to the revenue in proportion to their consumption of imported articles. The amount of tax thus raised was sufficient for all the expenses of the national Government; it was equal to about three dollars annually to each one of the whole population; being contributed by each of them in proportion to their style or expense of living. It was probably as justly apportioned among the people as any tax could be. This duty was, however, collected from comparatively few. The Government received it from those who were best able to advance the tax until the consumers, who eventually pay whatever duties are assessed, could refund the amount. The importing merchant who paid a duty of over one hundred per cent. on the cost of a cargo of tea or spices never considered himself taxed to that extent because he had paid the duty on his cargo to the Government. It was returned to him when he sold his cargo, together with the cost abroad and the expenses of the voyage. And so in regard to each purchaser of any portion of the cargo; when sold again the cost was returned, until the articles came into the possession of the consumer, who finally paid the whole cost, including all duties and expenses.

The same principle prevails in regard to the internal revenue duties on products and manufactures. The tax is paid by the consumers; but the duty should be collected from the fewest number possible, and on the fewest articles; and it should be collected by the Government from those who are best able to advance the payment, which will in the end be reimbursed by the consumer. It is a tax on the consumer, and the manufacturer or producer who pays the duty to the Government is no more taxed than is the merchant who pays the duty prescribed by the tariff on an imported cargo.

The income and other taxes are different; they are intended to be imposed directly on those who pay them.

It seems to me important to keep in view the distinction between duties and taxes; the duty being a general tax on the consumers, and not upon those who pay it to the Government, except so far as they may be consumers of the articles on which duty is imposed; while a tax is borne by the party from whom the Government collects it.

In preparing the tax laws, four great principles have been kept in view by the committee who have had the duty of preparing those measures, though they have not always been adhered to: that the taxation should, as far as possible, be definite in regard to its application and the rate upon the articles to be taxed; that it should be in the form and mode least liable to be evaded, and apportioned equally upon those from whom it was to be collected; that the payment should be convenient by assessing the duty on articles when in the form required for general use or consumption and in the possession of those who were best able to advance the amount of the tax, which comes at last from the consumer of the articles on which the duty is assessed; and finally, that it should be economical in regard to the labor and care and attention to insure its efficient assessment and collection.

This proposed "tax on sales" seems to violate all these principles of taxation. As I have said before, it taxes every object that can be sold, and taxes almost every person in the community. It will be vexatious and inconvenient, because it requires every farmer and mechanic who is above the condition of a hired laborer or journeyman to go each month with his list or return to the assessor and then to the collector to pay the tax on all the sales he has made during the preceding month. To a vast majority of such persons, the time required and the trouble in preparing the returns will be more of a tax than the amount of money they have to pay.

In regard to the economy of collecting such a tax, if it is intended to enforce its collection monthly upon all transfers of property by sale, every tenth man in the community should be in the revenue service to watch the business of his neighbors and pry into every petty detail of every transaction, and upon the greater number the tax imposed will not be enough to pay the cost of collection.

It is indefinite, and especially so in the opportunity it will afford to cheat the Government on the one hand and to cheat the consumer on the other. The honest, conscientious seller will make true returns of his sales, but who can know anything about the correctness of the returns made by those who are dishonest and unscrupulous? After this tax is imposed what proportion of all the sales that are made will be a subject of record, and in what possible manner can any returns of sales to the assessor be verified?

It will operate unequally because, to a consumer far removed from the centers of business, many articles must pass through many hands and be sold many times before they reach him. He may have to pay the tax many times over on the flour, or groceries, or cloth which his family consume; while those who live in or near the great centers of trade can purchase from the large wholesale dealers. The effect will be to discourage small traffic, and to concentrate trade in great establishments. Equality of taxation would require that every barrel of flour consumed in any part of the country should have paid but one and the same tax to the Government; but with this "tax on sales" the tax on a barrel of flour will depend on the number of transfers by purchase that may have occurred from the sale of the wheat by the farmer who produced it until it reaches the consumer in the shape of flour.

It is said that this "tax on sales" will reach the farmers and mechanics and all those persons having annual incomes less than $600 or producing annually less than $1,000, who, it is said, are now exempt from taxation. But it is not true that such persons are not taxed now, unless it is assumed that the amount of duty paid by a manufacturer or by an importer is a tax upon them and not upon the consumer. If it were possible, I would willingly exempt from taxation all who depend for their support upon their daily labor, and all the brave soldiers in our armies, who are now exempted only from the inconvenience and vexation of making returns to the assessors and the payment of duties in small amounts which would not be worth the cost of collection. The proposition to impose a tax on every transfer of property by sale has been presented and urged before both of the committees of Congress for the last four years as a novel, original, and ingenious form of taxation, when in fact it is an old and exploded form which has long been condemned as most unjust and oppressive in all European countries. As early as the fourteenth century it existed in Spain, and the experience of its effect there, as recorded, is well worthy of consideration by those who propose to introduce it into this country. It was called the "alcavala," and was an ad valorem tax on all transfers of property as often as it changed ownership.

The "alcavala" applied to wholesale and retail transactions of all kinds, and all sales of real estate. The provinces of Catalonia and Arragon purchased about a hundred and fifty years ago an exemption by substituting for it a special tax on incomes and rents. After that substitution those provinces began to prosper, while the rest of the country was languishing in feebleness and decay. It has been said the Catholic religion caused this decay in Spain. But France, situated by her side, though Catholic, was flourishing and prosperous, and is now unquestionably the first of European Powers. Historians have generally agreed in attributing the decline of Spanish prosperity and power to her laws of trade, and have represented the "tax on sales" as one of the most injurious of them. An intelligent writer has said of it, "When traffic stops prosperity stops, and we affirm without fear of contradiction that it was the 'alcavala' which took the life-blood out of Spanish prosperity by checking the circulation of property."

I have stated the principles which have influenced the committee in preparing the measures for taxation which they have submitted in this and in the last Congress. I now ask the patience of the House for a few moments longer, to make some general remarks on those measures which have been adopted and the bill now under consideration. If the measures are properly administered, in the present condition of the country, the annual revenue of the Government will be about $400,000,000, which is more than the revenue of the Government of Great Britain, if we assume the dollar to be worth a hundred cents in coin. This amount of revenue leaves a surplus, after paying the ordinary expenses of the Government, as they were before the war, and the interest on the public debt as it will be at the close of this fiscal year, of more than $200,000,000 to be applied to the extraordinary expenses of the war. I claim that no country has ever done so much in the same space of time to increase its revenue.

The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] told us during the last session of Congress what Great Britain did during the Napoleonic wars, which spread over a period of nearly a quarter of a century, to increase the revenue of the kingdom. He stated that taxation was increased until at last three quarters of the annual expenditures of that Government were raised by taxation, and only one quarter from loans. I venture to say that we have already done more to sustain the credit of this Government than Great Britain did during any year of that long war. Great Britain did not begin to raise by increase of taxation the additional means to carry on that war before it had reached its fourth year. Until then loans were relied upon for the extraordinary expenditures; and in no year of the war was a larger amount of revenue realized than we shall realize the coming year from the measures of taxation which we have established and proposed. No nation has ever been engaged in so expensive a war as this has been. The power of Great Britain has not been arrayed against us; but all the resources of that country have been at the command of the rebels to supply them with everything requisite in the way of armament to carry on this war of rebellion. British arms and ammunition, British ships, British officers and men. The great interest in Europe, as well as in this country, in the contest between the Kearsarge and the Alabama, was owing to the fact that the Alabama was a British vessel, armed with British guns, and manned with British seamen and artillerymen. In some of the forts recently captured, guns are said to have been found which, by contract, can be made only for the British Government, and having upon them the broad arrow of the British admiralty. I refer to these facts only to show the necessity for the great outlay that has been required to meet the rebels in this contest, and to account for the vast expenditures of this war.

I claim that thus far Congress has done all that was requisite to provide means for the conduct of the war and to sustain the credit of the Government; and that now it is only necessary that the laws which have been enacted and are proposed should be faithfully and efficiently administered. The tax laws which have been passed have been well considered and judicious, and are cheerfully sustained by the people. Time is required to perfect the system and the machinery for the collection of the taxes. Believing, as I do, that the present condition of the system is hardly yet equal to the efficient and faithful collection of those taxes which have been imposed, I hope we shall wait for the further development and perfection of the system of collection before venturing upon any more experiments in taxation that are new and untried in this country; and that we shall leave the question of any greater increase of taxation than the committee have recommended to the next Congress, when there will be the additional information derived from the experience of another year to guide them.

It is sometimes profitable to look back for the purpose of comparing the past with the present time, that we may judge of our progress and how far the promises made in the past have been fulfilled. In a speech which I made in this House three years ago I stated that the Committee of Ways and Means were engaged in perfecting the details of a tax bill, proposing a moderate rate of taxation upon most of the articles of necessary consumption, with higher rates on distilled spirits and other articles of luxury, and on legacies and incomes; and that from those sources, in connection with the duties on imports, the committee confidently expected the Government to derive an annual revenue of at least $150,000,000; sufficient to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government and the interest on a public debt of $1,250,000,000. I stated then that the committee recommended loans, with taxation sufficient to meet the ordinary expenses, the interest on the public debt, and an excess beyond, to be applied, after the war was over, to the extinguishment of the public debt.

The actual results have more than realized those expectations of the committee. It appears from the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the revenue for the year ending 30th June, 1864 was $260,632,717. He also estimates the revenue for the year ending 30th June, 1865, at $344,512,000, and for the year ending 30th June, 1866, including the taxes now proposed, at $396,000,000; these estimates include only $70,000,000 each year from customs, the actual receipts of which in the last year were $102,000,000.

The foregoing figures seem to me fully to warrant my previous assertion that the revenue of the next year will be $400,000,000; and I think it is more likely to exceed than to be below that sum. The result of the measures proposed for revenue have fully realized the expectations of the committee; and I believe they have realized all the reasonable expectations of the country, notwithstanding the indignation expressed by my colleague, who seems to be afflicted with "taxation on the brain" since being brought to the bar of the House to excuse himself for the neglect of his duties on the evening when the tax bill was under consideration.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I rise to oppose the amendment. I do not agree with those gentlemen upon this floor who express a desire for further taxation. And I almost think that this House has so squandered the funds and property of the country that they have almost excluded themselves from increasing the taxes to any great extent. But I do recognize the fact that in some way we must raise a sum of money sufficient to meet the current expenses of the Government, and the question is, where most conveniently and with the least burden to the people can we lay this tax? For my own part, instead of believing, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] has declared, that this kind of tax will be a burden upon the poorer classes of the community, I think it places the heavier burden upon the large consumers, and enables those who can limit their consumption almost to escape from taxation.

It is not true that the tax we levy upon sales necessarily falls upon the consumer alone. If this is so, then when you levy a specific tax on manufacturers, by a combination they can increase the price of the articles, and all that comes out of the poorer classes of the community. That is an evil we could not avoid. The question is this: where, with the least injustice, are we enabled to collect this money? Take the city of New York and compare it with almost any agricultural district of the State of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN], and you will find that in proportion to wealth ten times the amount will be paid in New York that is paid in any agricultural portion of the State of Illinois.

But I recognize this difficulty at this present time; that in introducing a new principle it requires guards, requires time and caution in applying it to existing taxation. I should prefer that this proposition had had the serious indorsement of the Committee of Ways and Means, but as it is, if in any tolerable shape it can be presented to the committee I shall vote for it; and I believe, so far as the West is concerned, they, as a general thing, would be in favor of the principle.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] by reducing the amount to one mill. I offer the amendment in order to enable me to make a few remarks.

Anxious as I am to increase the revenues of the Treasury, nothing but the clearest conviction of the impolicy of this tax at all would lead me to vote against it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has asserted that the tax upon manufactures now levied by the present law comes out of the consumer. Now that remark needs a very large amount of qualification. I admit that in prosperous times, when prices are advancing, it does come out of the consumer; but whenever prices shall begin to recede, as they have already, then the tax will come out of the manufacturer. It is inevitable, and cannot be avoided.

I was surprised to hear the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY], representing such a community as he does, remark that we should so regulate our tariff as to reach manufacturers. Why, do not gentlemen know that whenever we do reach the manufacturers in that way we are cut off entirely from all our resources from that source? That is the only way the gentleman could reach the manufacturers by his proposed anomaly of reducing the tariff.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] says that this tax will be one of easy collection. I deny that. I say that it will be necessary to have an inspector or collector to follow and run down every transaction of the country. In order to collect it you must multiply tax-gatherers and inspectors. There are a great number of transactions that cannot otherwise and will not otherwise be reached. How are you to reach trades made by barter under this section? If persons choose to make a barter-trade, will they be exempt? If two men who have licenses are taxed when they buy horses, will they be taxed when they swap horses? When a man who brings his basket of eggs or some muskrat and coon skins to a store and sells them for tobacco and salt, will he be taxed?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the gentleman from Vermont had observed the amendment proposed, not his own amendment which he suggested to the House a few days ago and had printed, but the amendment which I had the honor to submit last night, he would have seen that the tax is levied only upon licensed dealers, and licensed dealers are persons, under the law, who sell $1,000 or more.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that, and I believe that that is an improvement. I am ready to concede that. But, at the same time, look at the inequality in the business of the country which it would involve. Here is a man to-day who buys wool or produce, who is not licensed, and not subject to taxation. If he were licensed he would have to pay a tax of one half of one per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one gentleman here from New York [Mr. FRANK] suggested that the largest income tax payer in the city of New York is in favor of this tax. Of course. Why, he owns a whole block, and he can sell his goods, importer as he is, and manufacturer as he is, either at retail, as a jobber, or as a wholesale dealer, and it will necessarily concentrate the business in New York more and more into the hands of such capitalists as he is.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the gentleman, in fairness to the committee and to the magnitude of this question, that he keep in mind the provisions of the law passed by Congress under his lead, which sets forth very distinctly that produce dealers are persons liable to license, and under the amendment I propose they will be liable to tax upon their sales.

Mr. MORRILL. That depends entirely upon the amount.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Over $1,000.

Mr. MORRILL. If their business does not amount to over $1,000, then they are exempt; but all over $1,000 will not be exempt. The effect would be to scatter the sales of the country into the hands of small dealers, for the very purpose of evading this tax so far as produce is concerned.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in relation to another point, I believe that this amendment is going to operate upon the poor of the country. The articles of luxury consumed in this country are by no means the major part. The vast amounts of the sales of the country are purely and simply of the necessities of life; and you are therefore proposing to tax the poor man with a large family, who is compelled to buy the necessities of life, almost as much as you do the rich man. There is no escape from that. The very men that we have exempted from license, the very men that we have exempted from the income tax, will not be able to escape this tax.

Mr. ODELL. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the motion before the committee, and do so simply to call the attention of the members of the House to the statement made a few days since by the Representative from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] when he introduced the bill now under consideration from the Committee of Ways and Means. His estimate was that the sales of the country would reach only $3,000,000,000 per annum, and the tax proposed would yield but $15,000,000. I do not know upon what basis my friend made his estimates. I confess his statement surprised me, and I have no doubt the same effect was produced upon the minds of other members of the House. An investigation, partial, it is true, has led me to a widely different conclusion. I am well aware, Mr. Chairman, that the amount to be obtained by the proposed tax is as yet a problem—one difficult to solve while our nation is engaged in war. The unsettled condition of our commerce increases the difficulty. Yet we have data at our command that justifies a different conclusion.

From the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, just made, I find our imports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, were $314,514,559. Our exports for the same period were $340,666,080. Add the duty collected upon imports, as given in report referred to, amounting to $102,316,153 in gold, then add to that the premium upon gold, estimating it at 200, and to these the cost of freight, insurance, charges, and profits, at say ten per cent.; these make the total of values of foreign trade alone the sum of $905,264,397 as the first valuation, upon which this tax of one half per cent. ad valorem is to be assessed. Estimating goods to change hands by sales three times, which is the lowest calculation, you have a total upon which the tax will be levied of $2,715,793,191. The proposed tax, if assessed and collected, would yield $13,578,965. It will be seen the amounts thus given for our foreign commerce alone are in close proximity to the amount stated as the total sales of the country.

The products of our fisheries and manufactures, as stated by the census returns, show a total valuation of $1,751,650,000, not including the valuation of the States in rebellion, and this total is in prices of 1860. Upon the same basis of calculation, that goods change ownership by sale at least three times, the revenue to be derived from this class of sales would be $26,274,750. Thus it will be seen, if these estimates of value are correct, we shall obtain a revenue of $39,853,715 from sales growing out of our foreign trade and the manufactures of the country.

To these are to be added the vast agricultural products of the country sold as merchandise, which we think demonstrate most clearly that the estimate of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the sales of the country will aggregate $11,000,000,000, and yield a revenue of $55,000,000, are not over-stated; on the contrary, we believe if this measure shall become law that the receipts under its provisions will be much larger than his estimates. During the discussion of this measure, among the objections urged by members opposing it is that its collection would be attended with great difficulty and open to extensive frauds.

Our best informed collectors and assessors do not agree in this opinion.

Frauds have been committed in all ages and under every system of levying taxes and imposts. There is great security in the low rate of tax proposed under this bill. It has been alleged that this is an untried system. This statement is not entirely correct; under existing laws a tax on sales of merchandise by brokers of one eighth of one per cent. is levied, and also at same rate all sales made at auction. I referred last night to the sales of gold, stocks, bonds, &c., upon which an ad valorem tax of one twentieth of one per cent. is levied and collected. So far as I have learned there has been no difficulty in the collection of taxes upon this class of sales. I fully believe no difficulty will arise if a similar tax is levied upon the sales of produce and merchandise, but, as in the cases referred to, it will be promptly and cheerfully paid. Only parties selling $1,000 and upward per annum, are taxed upon their sales.

This system commends itself to my judgment, and sense of justice, in the fact that it equalizes the burden of taxation, levying upon rich and poor in exact proportion to their consumption, be it more or less. As stated by my colleague, [Mr. FRANK] it has the approval of our leading influential commercial men, who not only see in its provisions a means of revenue, but also what is most desirable, it will give confidence in the securities of the Government.

No system of taxation adopted since our necessities compelled an internal tax to aid in the prosecution of the war has to so great an extent the indorsement of the country.

The Secretary of the Treasury recommends it now, although formerly opposed to it. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue strongly recommends it as the most available means of increasing our revenue, which they both urge upon us as a duty to provide. We are still engaged in prosecuting the war for the restoration of the Union, hence our duty is a plain one to enact such laws as will secure the means of carrying it on successfully. The people are ready and willing to respond to any levies that may be necessary for us to make upon them by law for this patriotic object. I hope, Mr. Chairman, this measure will be adopted by both Houses of Congress, believing fully that it will prove an efficient method of raising money.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Committee rise for the purpose of closing debate upon this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the tax bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the pending paragraph of the tax bill close in five minutes after the committee shall resume the consideration of the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 744, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That unmanufactured breadstuffs shall be exempt from the operation of this tax.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to add "and provisions."

Mr. ALLISON. I modify my amendment in that respect.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to amend by striking out section four, and inserting as a substitute for it the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for a division of the question on striking out and inserting.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be on the motion to strike out.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That all sales of breadstuffs and provisions which are sold by the original manufacturers and producers shall be exempted from this tax.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

That unmanufactured breadstuffs shall be exempt from the operation of this tax.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the point of order that that amendment has been already rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment before proposed covered breadstuffs and provisions. This amendment is confined to breadstuffs alone. The Chair thinks it is in order.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RADFORD. I move to amend the amendment so as to provide that sales shall be taxed where the amount does not exceed $200.

Mr. KASSON. Sales are not proposed to be taxed where they do not exceed $1,000.

Mr. RADFORD. My amendment is to tax all sales over $200, irrespective of license.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the following as a substitute:

That from and after the 1st day of April, 1865, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, on all sales of produce and merchandise and other articles, including all personal property, but not including bullion or coin of any description, nor securities for money, evidences of debt, nor sales made at auction, one half of one per cent. where the amount of such sales exceeds fifty dollars in any one month, the amount of sales to be returned by the vendor monthly, in the same manner and at the same time as is provided by law for the returns of manufactures; and all the provisions of the act to which this act is an amendment relating to the assessment and collection, and to the enforcement of the law relating to manufactures, shall extend to and be applied, as far as applicable, to sales of produce and merchandise as aforesaid. This section to remain in force for the period of one year, during which period no person or persons who shall be required to pay the tax or duty enforced by this section shall be required to pay an additional license tax or duty where the rate of such license tax or duty is graduated, under existing law, by the amount of sales or receipts.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend the substitute by striking out the words, "but not including bullion or coin of any description, nor securities for money, evidences of debt, nor sales made at auction."

The amendment to the substitute was rejected.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I move to amend the substitute by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That all sales of farm products by first and second holders shall be exempt from the provisions of this section.

The amendment to the substitute was rejected.

The question was taken on the substitute; and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. BOUTWELL's amendment.

Mr. KASSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ODELL and MORRILL were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 56.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. A. MYERS. I move to amend the section just adopted by adding thereto the following:

Provided, also, That in section ninety-six of the act to which this is an amendment, where the word twenty occurs it shall be stricken out and the word ten inserted, so that the duty on coal illuminating oil, refined, and naphtha, benzine, and benzole, produced by distillation of coal, asphaltum, state peat, petroleum or rock-oil, and all other bituminous substances used for like purposes, shall be ten cents per gallon.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a question of order, that this amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. A. MYERS. I cannot see why it is not in order. Coal oil does not seem to be in order at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee having passed by that section, the Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to strike out section four.

The CHAIRMAN. That question has already been taken and decided in the negative.

Mr. BROOKS. I offer the following as a proviso to the section just adopted:

Provided, That there shall be levied and collected from the vendor on all sales of personal property not goods, wares, or merchandise, one fourth of one per cent. of each vendor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would ask what kind of personal property is that which is not comprised in goods, wares, or merchandise?

Mr. BROOKS. Cattle, corn, wheat, beef, pork, butter, cheese, &c. I do not want the dealers in merchandise in cities to be taxed alone. I do not want a man who sells $5,000 worth of cheese to avoid all taxation.

The amendment of Mr. Brooks was rejected.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Resolution (S. No. 42) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road.

An act (S. No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HOOPER. I offer the following as an additional section:

Sec.—And be it further enacted, That section one hundred and ten be amended by inserting after the words "1st day of July, 1864," the words: "Provided, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1865, in lieu of the rates of duty on deposits and on circulation prescribed by this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one tenth of one per cent. on the average amount of deposits of money subject to payment by check, draft, or represented by certificates of deposit or otherwise, and of one fourth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or persons; and from and after the 31st day of December, 1865, a duty of one half of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of such circulation as aforesaid, except that banks which before the 1st day of July, 1865, shall have reduced the circulation since the 1st of January, 1861, to the extent of three quarters, shall be subject only on their remaining circulation to a tax of one twelfth of one per cent. each month. And whenever the outstanding circulation of any bank, association, corporation, company, or person shall be reduced to an amount not exceeding five per cent. of the chartered or declared capital, when the same was issued, said circulation shall be free from taxation; and whenever any State bank or banking association has been converted into a national banking association, and such national banking association has assumed the liabilities of such State bank or banking association, including the redemption of its circulation, or in case a national banking association shall become the owner or possessor of the assets of any State bank that has surrendered its charter or ceased to exist, or shall become liable for the redemption of the circulation of any State bank, such national banking association shall be held to make the required return and payment on such circulation outstanding, so long as it shall exceed five per cent. of the capital while it existed as a bank or banking association;" and by inserting before the words "nor to any savings bank" the words "nor to trust companies which shall receive no deposits subject to payment by check or draft."

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order, that this is substantially the same amendment which has already been rejected by the committee.

Mr. HOOPER. This is an additional section, and has never been offered before. Some parts of this amendment were not in the former amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. In order to bring it within the rules, the Chair holds that it must be literally the same amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. Is not this substantially the former amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KERNAN. I would ask if this mode of tearing legislation through is very commendable.

Mr. HOOPER. Several members on this side have said that they misunderstood the question when it was presented before.

Mr. GANSON. Do those gentlemen intend to vote against it? I do not suppose that anybody has changed the other way.

Mr. HOOPER. I think that some of the gentlemen on the other side may have changed their opinions after sleeping on the subject.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is substantially the same proposition that has been before this House over and over again. What is the reason of this persistent effort of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] at the last session and at this, not only to build up a system of banks which shall enjoy special advantages under the national law, but to strike out of existence at one blow, without any reasonable time for a change, State institutions which are interwoven with business of the country, and which, if we may rely upon the testimony of intelligent bankers and business men of all parties, cannot be stricken down without great detriment to the best interests of the business community?

The State banks are now paying more than two per cent. a year on their circulation and deposits. They labor under great disadvantages as compared with the national banks. They are liable to heavy State taxation. Owing to the policy adopted toward them by our legislation heretofore they will doubtless be obliged to change their plan of operations and come under the national system. Why should we not allow the change to go on gradually? Why should we seek to inaugurate hostile legislation against a very large amount of capital, against a numerous class of business men, and against institutions which the States have clearly the right to incorporate? The harmony and good feeling which should exist between the Federal Government and the Legislatures of the various States will be greatly marred by this endeavor to strike down these State institutions, the capital invested in which is being beneficially employed in the business of the country.

This House has again and again declared its judgment on this question. This proposition received but a very small vote yesterday. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means expressed himself strongly as to the evils which would result from this harsh legislation, as he justly termed it. I hope that the House will not to-day contradict its deliberate judgment declared yesterday. The continued agitation of this violent attack upon the banking system of the States cannot do any good. To impose, as proposed in this amendment, a tax of six per cent. per annum upon the circulation of these State institutions is equivalent to saying that they shall be destroyed after the lapse of six months.

I trust, sir, that the committee will adhere to the opinion which it clearly and deliberately declared yesterday, as well as on former occasions when efforts of this kind have been made. It seems to me that it is due to ourselves that we should show that no member can succeed in carrying through, by mere pertinacity and persistence, a proposition like this, so sweeping and so destructive to the business interests of the country.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move, pro forma, to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. An amendment in many respects similar to this was, on my motion, adopted by this House at the last session. In the Senate it was stricken out, or rather so modified as to take away its effect. The present Secretary of the Treasury, then the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, opposed the amendment adopted by the House. That gentleman has since become convinced of the necessity of changing these State banks into national institutions. He then announced from his seat in the Senate, giving the people of the country fair warning, that if they did not convert their State banks into national institutions he would at the next session favor legislation similar to that now proposed here.

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman has no right to lug in the debates of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am not talking about the proceedings of the Senate, but I am merely replying to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.]

Mr. GANSON. I rise to another question of order. The gentleman is not confining his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope that the amendment will be adopted. Sufficient time has been taken up with the discussion of this subject. We are all acquainted with the bearings of the proposition. I hope that the amendment will be adopted without further delay. I know that members were absent yesterday when the vote was taken. Those members are now here. I suppose some members, as was stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, were not advised of the nature of the question when they voted. Let us have a fair test in the committee of taxing the State banks out of existence or compelling them to be metamorphosed into national banks.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, had I been a member of this House when this national banking system was adopted, with the little knowledge I have on banking, I would have voted against it; but the system has been adopted through the wisdom of Congress, and has become one which is favored not only by the country generally but is highly favored by the Department having our finances in charge.

It is very clear to me that both systems cannot exist together; that this great national banking system having been adopted as the system of the country, the State system, if it exists, will come into collision with the national system and will prevent its full and perfect play and harmony of development. In that view, although I have a good deal of doubt in regard to the amendment, I have concluded that I shall favor it. I believe that it will be for the best interests of the country. I believe that it is called for by those having charge of our national finances. For one, with the limited knowledge I have on finances, I am not able to oppose such an amendment. Certain time is given, up to next January, for all State banks now existing to become national banking institutions. It is time enough; and I believe that the policy of the Government having been established in favor of the system, we must take measures to prevent the State system coming into collision with the national system.

Mr. FARNSWORTH withdrew his amendment.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois expressed his desire that we should take such action as to compel the State banks to give up their State charters. Does he hold that Congress has a right to destroy institutions which the States have constitutionally created? I conceive we may for the purpose of revenue tax.

Mr. WILSON. I make the point of order that no amendment is pending.

Mr. KERNAN. I renew the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, while you are passing a revenue bill here, which it is proper to do, under cover of that it is proposed to destroy these State institutions. Can we destroy railway corporations which the States have created, by putting a tax upon them so that they will be compelled to destroy the State charters and take charters from us? Is that the doctrine in reference to the legitimate rights of the States and of the Federal Government? It seems to me that this is putting forth a precedent showing that we are disposed to claim the exercise of a power to destroy the institutions which the courts have said that the States may legitimately incorporate. The courts of the United States have decided over and over again that the States have a right to establish them. My friend is a lawyer and knows it. The doctrine in the early days was whether the Federal Government could incorporate a single bank as a fiscal agent. I hope that the amendment will be rejected. I withdraw my amendment to it.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of terminating debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being bill of the House No. 744, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles:

An act (S. No. 212) for the relief of Henry A. Brigham; and

An act (S. No. 410) to enlarge the port of entry and delivery for the district of Philadelphia; When the Speaker signed the same.

KEWEENAW CANAL BILL.

Mr. DRIGGS. I rise to a question of privilege. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill known as the Keweenaw canal bill was yesterday recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 454) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York, and to appoint an assistant collector to reside at Jersey City," approved February 21, 1863; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

TAX BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that all debate be terminated in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the proposition for taxing banks in one minute after the committee shall resume its consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 744, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

Mr. GANSON. As the law now stands, the local banks of the city of Buffalo pay a tax of about six per cent. upon their capital—two to the Government and four for local purposes. If the pending proposition is adopted, all the banking capital of the State of New York will be entirely withdrawn from local taxation. I say, therefore, that no gentleman who has the interest of the people of his own locality at heart will favor this amendment.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. HOOPER,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOOPER and KERNAN were appointed.

The committee divided, in the midst of much confusion, and the tellers disagreeing on the count,

The CHAIRMAN ordered new tellers, and appointed Messrs. GANSON, and WASHBURN of Illinois.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 63.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of notes of any State bank or State banking association paid out by them after the 1st day of January, 1866.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "State banking association" where they last occur the words "or national banking association," so that the tax shall be imposed upon all bills of any State bank or national bank paid out. The amendment merely imposes a tax upon banks which pay out State bank bills. I want to include all bills.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed.

Mr. MORRILL. As the gentleman from New York has spoken in favor of his amendment to the amendment, it is but just that the gentleman from Iowa should have an opportunity to reply. After that I shall insist that all debate be closed.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from New York but a few moments ago said that the renewal of this proposition, after the expression of the committee yesterday, was trifling with the committee. In the same speech he told us that any interference with the circulation of State banks would interfere materially with the business of the country. Now, sir, he proposes not only to interfere with State bank circulation, but also to cut off the circulation of national banks. I submit that, according to the gentleman's own argument, he is trifling with the committee in proposing this amendment.

Mr. KERNAN. I am not in favor of this proposition; but if we are to tax these bills ten per cent. I propose that it shall be on all the bills of all banks.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman has told us that a tax of this kind would drive out of circulation the notes of the State banks and would interfere with the business of the country. And now he proposes to drive out of circulation also the notes of the national banks, and thus interfere to a greater degree with the business of the country. Sir, the proposition which I have submitted is simply this: it permits the present system of taxation upon the circulation of State banks to continue until the 1st day of January, 1866; and after that time, upon all notes paid out by State banks, or national banks and issued by State banks, there shall be a tax of ten per cent., in order to retire from circulation, and thus diminish the volume of our currency, notes issued by State banks or banking associations. It is a proposition to permit the present system to remain up to that time, giving abundant time even to the banks of Pennsylvania to comply with the provisions of the statute of that State in winding up their affairs,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1865.

NEW SERIES...No. 56.

and prepare to take their places under the national system, if they are to continue the business of banking.

The question now being upon Mr. KERNAN's amendment to the amendment, Mr. WILSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GANSON, and WASHBURN of Illinois, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 61.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. WILSON's amendment.

Mr. BROOMALL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON and PRYOR were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 62.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend on page 38 by striking out in line four the word "six" and inserting "twelve" in lieu thereof; so that the section will read:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all crude petroleum or rock-oil that may be produced or sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a duty of twelve cents on each and every gallon, &c.

Mr. Chairman, when the original system of internal revenue was adopted it was plain that the article of high wines could not stand a tax of more than twenty cents per gallon, and the committee finally fixed that as the amount of tax to be imposed upon the production of domestic liquors throughout the United States.

The manufacturers of that article supposed that that would destroy the business; but instead of destroying the business it gave an increased impetus to the manufacture of high wines. The tax was afterward increased to sixty cents per gallon, and still the manufacture of high wines continued, until Congress put upon it a tax of two dollars per gallon, which it is calculated will yield to the Government a revenue of $80,000,000.

Now, sir, here is the article of petroleum, which is produced with less cost and less labor than the article of high wines, and which is proposed to be taxed only six cents a gallon. Here is an article which, in the time of our country's need, seems to have been produced by Providence, in its wisdom, in this great emergency, which can pay the national debt and maintain the national credit if we tax it as we ought to do.

Sir, this article alone ought to yield to the Government, by a tax of twelve cents per gallon, at least $25,000,000 per year; and that amount this Congress can get out of it if they will tax it as they ought to do. The tax would not be materially felt; it would not interfere with consumption; and time will show that petroleum itself can stand a tax of twenty-five cents a gallon without materially interfering with the consumption of the article.

I move, then, that the tax be made twelve cents per gallon, and I hope that the amendment will be adopted, and that Pennsylvania will be let contribute, as she can well afford to do, to pay the national debt and support the national credit.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish the gentleman from Illinois, having spoken, would withdraw his amendment and allow me to offer another.

Mr. INGERSOLL. An amendment to my amendment would be in order.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not want so trifling an amendment voted on at all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I shall not withdraw it, because I desire it to be voted on.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I supposed the gentleman was in fun in offering an amendment of this kind.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is where the gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Well, sir, I will make one remark, and I do not wish to make it offensively at all to the gentlemen, but I do think, if he is not jesting now, that before he offers an amendment of that kind he ought to make himself acquainted with the subject about which he proposes to legislate.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Without being offensive to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will state that I have made myself familiar with the subject.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman from Illinois has told us that he thinks this article can stand in the future a tax of twenty-five cents a gallon. He has made himself well acquainted with the subject, and he proposes here to put on it a tax of forty cents per gallon. He says he knows all about the subject, and thinks that after awhile it will be able to stand a tax of twenty-five cents, and therefore he proposes to put on a tax of forty cents now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman is mistaken. I propose a tax of twelve cents, not of forty.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The tax on refined rock-oil (for I never use the pompous term "petroleum," my own language is good enough for me), by the law of last session, twenty cents a gallon. The gentleman now proposes to put on twelve cents a gallon more, which is equal to twenty cents more on the refined article—the article used by the people—making forty cents per gallon. I thought it probable that the gentleman did not consider that part of it; and that was why I made the remark, in which I did not design to be personal at all.

I think, Mr. Chairman, it was Burke who complained that the English minister of finance did not distinguish between taxation and revenue. If you pass this section, not as the gentleman from Illinois proposes to amend it, but even as it has been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, the American people can, with propriety, make the same complaint of us. The tax proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means would leave a tax of thirty cents a gallon on refined rock-oil for home consumption. When that article comes in competition with the oil refined from coal, which only pays a tax of fifteen cents, and which only needs an advantage of from three to five cents in the market to undersell it, the revenue from that source will be destroyed altogether. The people will study economy in the use of the article. You will introduce everywhere its domestic competitor, candles, and its manufactured competitor, coal-oil; and you will find, when Congress meets next session, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will report a diminished amount of revenue, although you will have imposed the increased vexation to the people of a double assessment, a double collection, and a double inspection.

Mr. A. MYERS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting three cents a gallon instead of twelve. I certainly did think, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] was in fun when he offered his amendment. I thought so because I had been impressed with the very good-humored countenance which that gentleman wore while he was making his speech. The gentleman from Illinois should recollect that when the question of a duty on pamphlets, magazines, and American poets and poetesses, was up, we were extremely liberal to him. Now, sir, he has said that this article should pay a duty of $25,000,000, and he has referred to the question of high wines. Does the gentleman know what the present production of rock-oil is? Does he call it a manufactured article? Does he think that because it flows out of the earth sometimes, we get it in pumping wells for nothing? I ask the gentleman and I ask the committee to aid us in promoting the interests of petroleum. Its present product is about six thousand barrels a day. At three cents a gallon we will get a revenue of $1,800,000.

Now, gentlemen will recollect that when you put a duty upon the crude oil you must double that amount in order to get at the true tax upon the refined oil. My colleague [Mr. SCOFIELD] has said that a duty of twelve cents a gallon on crude oil is equal to twenty cents a gallon on refined oil. He is certainly, in my opinion, rather under than over the proper estimate.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. A. MYERS] will allow me to correct him. His colleague [Mr. SCOFIELD] said that a tax of twelve cents on the crude oil would be equal to forty cents on the refined oil.

Mr. A. MYERS. That shows that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] did not understand my colleague. It is now twenty cents on the refined oil, and every cent of tax put on the crude oil is doubled on the refined oil; so that, to put twelve cents on the crude oil would raise the tax on the refined oil to forty cents a gallon.

Now, I appeal to gentlemen upon this floor to take into consideration and ascertain whether, by this kind of legislation, they will increase or decrease the revenue by this addition. During the first year these laws were in operation there was collected from the article of rock-oil $700,000 of revenue. During the last year, after you had raised your tax from ten to twenty cents, the revenue derived from the same source did not amount to as much as the year before, when the tax was only ten cents a gallon. That is what we told Congress last session; and the facts have shown that our predictions were correct. The oil interest is not asking any favor on this floor. We are willing to pay our share of the burdens of this country in putting down this rebellion. If we could break down the rebellion by turning a flowing oil well upon it, and setting fire to the pipe, we would be glad to do it.

It is not proposed, as I understand it, by the committee to do away with the drawback duty so far as the refined article is concerned, but it is to be done away with on the crude oil. When you put this tax of twelve cents upon the crude article, which amounts to twenty or twenty-five cents on the refined article, you put that much extra tax upon it before it is exported to foreign markets. The committee will see the danger they are in from foreign competition in foreign markets.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to state in a few words the motives that have controlled the Committee of Ways and Means in endeavoring to adjust this tax without prejudice to the great oil-producing interest of the country on the one hand and the Treasury of the Government on the other. It is stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. A. MYERS] that the production of this oil is about six thousand barrels per day, which in the course of the year will amount to one million eight hundred thousand barrels, throwing out Sundays and holidays, and the revenue upon that, at six cents a gallon, will amount to $4,320,000.

Now, it will be observed that the committee recognize the tax upon the refined article to be twenty cents a gallon, and propose no increase of that. It has been found, however, that we have been deprived of a very considerable portion of the revenue to which we are entitled in that way. It has been deemed best, therefore, to take the article at the fountain-head, and impose a low rate of tax upon the article as it flows from the earth, in lieu of any enhancement of the tax upon the refined article. We allow no drawback upon the crude article. It is an excise duty, and therefore whether exported or retained, the amount of the duty is added to the price of the article itself. We found by our inquiries that by this mode of retaining the drawback upon the refined article we leave the markets of Europe open upon perhaps more advantageous terms than to the foreign refiner himself. That does not prejudice the refiner in respect to the article he exports to foreign countries. We enhance the tax upon the crude article, which is levied not only from our own citizens, but from the citizens of foreign countries. We adopted it in this case because it was found, in our judgment, after very careful inquiries, that there was no article produced abroad that could successfully compete with the crude article subject to the tax proposed by the committee. If you enhance that tax, as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, I fear that, with so large an enhancement of the price of the crude article, you may be disappointed in respect to the consumption of the article abroad. I trust, therefore, that the House will see fit to adopt the system reported by the committee after the most careful consideration, consulting the oil-producing interest as thoroughly as any other interest has been consulted. I trust that we shall neither go too far in the enhancement of the tax on the one side, nor reduce it too low on the other, thus depriving the Treasury of the fair proportion of revenue that ought to be derived from an article holding such an exceptional relation to the business of the country and of foreign countries as this article does.

Having explained thus the controlling motives of the committee, I move, at the request of my colleague, [Mr. MORRILL,] that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration as a special order the tax bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that when the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumes the consideration of the tax bill, all debate upon the subject of coal-oil be terminated in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the tax bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

Mr. A. MYERS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "two and a half."

Sir, I warn the committee that if this section shall pass as the Committee of Ways and Means have reported it (because I suppose no one seriously thinks of a duty of twelve cents) no crude oil can go abroad, and the domestic sale will be greatly diminished. By the imposition of this tax you will get less revenue than you now get from the tax of twenty cents per gallon on the refined oil, because you will diminish the sale at home and entirely stop the exportation.

Mr. A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue recommended a tax of three cents only on crude oil. Why the Committee of Ways and Means has not pursued the usual course and accepted the opinion of the head of the department I cannot say. I hope that the House will take, on this subject, the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who examined this subject very carefully, having before him numerous letters from collectors and other persons conversant with the actual business of collecting this revenue.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that if there is to be a change in the law on this subject, the proper method of regulating the matter is to impose an ad valorem tax. I believe that the oil interest can better stand an ad valorem tax of fifty per cent. than this tax of six cents a gallon. Without presuming to possess any great knowledge of this subject, I do undertake to say that many gentlemen here do not understand the facts with regard to the situation of these oil wells. At a well on the Allegheny river, within one mile of the railroad depot, crude oil brings on an average eleven dollars per barrel; while at a well on one of the small tributaries of Oil creek, six or seven miles from navigation or railroad, this oil brings but eight dollars per barrel. I ask this committee whether it is just that a man should pay six cents per gallon, or $2 40 a barrel, (a barrel holding forty gallons,) for which he gets eight dollars; while a man upon the Allegheny river only pays the same amount on a barrel for which he gets eleven dollars. I would make this tax, instead of so much per gallon, a percentage ad valorem. Although I am opposed to ad valorem being the established principle in a tariff, yet it operates very well in the internal revenue. I am compelled to refer to these things now, as debate has been cut off on all the succeeding paragraphs.

Sir, the true, just, and equitable way of imposing this tax is upon the ad valorem principle; and if I get the opportunity I will move that amendment to this bill.

This coal-oil interest is the interest which we are told is going to bear millions and millions of taxation. So it will if it is properly taken care of. Gentlemen suppose that every hole that is bored is a flowing well, whereas nine out of ten fail to produce oil in paying quantities. Let this new and young child of American wealth have a chance to grow, let its limbs and muscles become strong and powerful by use, and then it will bear all the reasonable taxes that you may impose on it. Sir, I regret that the haste of the committee has so abruptly cut off amendment and debate.

Mr. SCOFIELD's amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. INGERSOLL's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to amend by striking out "six" and inserting "three," so that it will read:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all crude petroleum or rock-oil that may be produced and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a duty of three cents on each and every gallon.

A MEMBER. Say five.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will say "five" instead of "three," at the suggestion of some of my friends.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. A. MYERS moved to strike out "six" and insert "three."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. A. MYERS moved to add the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the duty on crude oil that may be produced for sale or consumption shall be ten per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MORRILL. I raise the question of order that the amendment is not in order, not being germane to the pending section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to strike out the following:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all crude petroleum or rock-oil that may be produced and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a duty of six cents on each and every gallon; and all petroleum or rock-oil that may be in possession of the producers at the place of production, as aforesaid, shall be held and treated as if produced on that day; and the said duty shall be paid by the owner, agent, or superintendent of the well from which the petroleum or rock-oil has been produced within five days after the time of rendering the account required to be rendered by law of petroleum or rock-oil so chargeable with duty; and the said duty shall be a lien upon the same and on the well producing the same, with the buildings, fixtures, vessels, machinery, and tools, and on the lot or tract of land where the same may be, until the said duty shall be paid; and the person paying such duty, if other than the actual owner of said petroleum, shall have a lien on such petroleum for the repayment of the duties so advanced by him: Provided, That any person who shall produce petroleum or rock-oil, and use or refine the same without having paid the duty as aforesaid, shall, in addition to all other penalties and forfeitures, be liable to pay double the amount of duties as aforesaid thereon.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall be the owner of any well producing petroleum or rock-oil, or who shall have such well under his superintendence, either as agent for the owner or on his own account, and every person who shall use any well as aforesaid, either as owner, agent, or otherwise, shall, from day to day, make true and exact entry, or cause to be entered in a book to be kept for that purpose, the number of gallons of crude petroleum or rock-oil produced, and also the number of gallons removed for storage, or for sale, or for consumption, which book shall be open at all times when required for the inspection of the assessor, assistant assessor, collector, deputy collector, or inspector, who may take any memorandums or transcript thereof; and on the 1st, 11th, and 21st days of each and every month, or within five days thereafter, the owner, agent, or superintendent, shall render to the assessor of the district an account in duplicate of the number of gallons of petroleum or rock-oil produced, and also of the number of gallons sold, and of the number of gallons removed for consumption or sale or storage, not before accounted for.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all petroleum or rock-oil, before the same is used or removed for any purpose, shall be inspected and gauged by some inspector appointed for the performance of such duties, who shall mark upon the cask, tank, or other vessel, containing such petroleum or rock-oil, in a manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the quantity of the contents of such cask, tank, or vessel, with the date of inspection and the name of the inspector, and shall make a return of all petroleum or rock-oil so inspected, with the name of the producer, to the collector, and a duplicate thereof to the assessor of the district. And any person who shall attempt fraudulently to evade the payment of the duty, upon any petroleum or rock-oil by changing in any manner the mark upon any such cask, tank, or vessel, shall forfeit the sum of $100 for each cask, tank, or vessel so altered or changed, to be recovered in the manner provided for the recovery of penalties imposed by the act to which this act is an amendment; and any inspector or other person who shall knowingly put upon any such cask, tank, or vessel, any false or fraudulent mark shall be liable to the same penalty hereinbefore provided for each cask, tank, or vessel so fraudulently marked; and any person who shall purchase or sell any empty cask, tank, or vessel with the inspection marks thereon, or who shall use the same without removing the inspection marks therefrom, for the purpose of selling any other petroleum or rock-oil than that so inspected, shall be subject to a like penalty for each cask, tank, or vessel so purchased, sold, or used.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the point of order that these sections have been passed upon and cannot be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KASSON. In conformity to the direction of the Committee of Ways and Means I offer the following:

And be it further enacted, That wherever, under the proviso to section one hundred and three, the addition to any fare shall amount to a sum involving the fraction of one cent, any person or company liable to a duty of two and a half per cent., as said section provides, shall be authorized to add to each fare one cent in lieu of said fraction.

This matter has made some local trouble and litigation, and the committee have deemed it right to perfect the section in that way.

Mr. THAYER. I move the following substitute:

And be it further enacted, That section one hundred and three be amended so as to read as follows: That every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing or having the care or management of any railroad or steamboat engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or property for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, shall be subject to and pay a duty of two and a half per cent. on the gross receipts of such railroad or steamboat: Provided, That the duty hereby imposed shall not be charged upon receipts for the transportation of persons or property or mails between the United States and any foreign port; and any person or persons, firms, companies, or corporations, owning, possessing, or having the care of any toll-road, ferry, or bridge, authorized by law to receive toll for the transit of passengers, beasts, carriages, teams, and freight of any description over such toll-road, ferry, or bridge, shall be subject to and pay a duty of three per cent. on the gross amount of all their receipts of every description. But when the gross receipts of any such bridge or toll-road shall not exceed the amount necessarily expended to keep such bridge or road in repair, no tax shall be imposed on such receipts: Provided, That all such persons, companies, and corporations shall have the right to add the duty or tax imposed hereby to their rates of fare or freight whenever their liability thereto may commence, any limitations which may exist by law, or by agreement with any person or company which may have paid or be liable to pay such fare, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a question of order. This is a substitute for the whole original text, imposing a tax, and is not germane to my proposition.

Mr. THAYER. I will offer it as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means is to section one hundred and three, which is the same subject-matter covered by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, this House, by a respectable majority, when this subject was under consideration in another place, adopted the amendment proposed by my colleague on the other side, [Mr. STROUSE,] and that amendment was subsequently overridden by an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BROWN,] which last amendment proposed to reduce the tax imposed by section one hundred and three on common carriers to two and a half per cent. on the net receipts. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, which being offered as a substitute superseded that of my colleague, includes within its operation those methods and means of transportation such as ships, canal-barges, and boats.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I wish simply to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that while I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to accept his amendment as a substitute for the one I offered the other day, yet there are many members on this side of the House who desire to strike out the word "steamboats" from his substitute. I ask him to modify his amendment by striking that out.

Mr. THAYER. I have no objection, if it were possible, to take the sense of the committee upon the propriety of striking that out; but really I have not sufficient data, of my own knowledge, to adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. Chairman, I will state briefly to the committee that the object of my proposition is to exempt from the operation of the one hundred and third section (which section the committee will remember imposes a tax of two and a half per cent. upon the receipts of common carriers) sailing vessels, canal-boats, and canal-barges. I believe that every one who has examined this subject, and who knows anything about the operation of the law upon these interests, must agree that the operation of this one hundred and third section upon our sailing vessels, canal-boats, and canal-barges, and the owners of those methods of transportation, has been very injurious and very unjust.

If we intend to collect a tax upon shipping we should collect it in such a manner as shall not discriminate against our own shipping to the advantage of foreign shipping and to the prejudice of our own. If we must tax shipping, let us do it in the way of a tonnage tax, because by a tonnage tax we reach foreign shipping as well as our own. But this law operates to the prejudice of our own vessels. It imposes a burden upon our own which foreign vessels are exempt from; and upon that account it is unjust and impolitic.

In regard to its operation upon the other interests, canal-boats and canal-barges, I know from information received from those interested in that branch of the carrying trade, that its operation has been exceedingly unjust. It is impossible for them to pay the tax of two and a half per cent. which is imposed by the one hundred and third section of the recent act and carry on the business in which they are engaged with any profit at all. It is a destruction of the business itself.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman tell me whether, if this tax is reduced, the gentleman and his friends from Pennsylvania will reduce the price of coal at the same rate?

Mr. THAYER. I am very sorry, but there is so much confusion I cannot hear the question of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move to amend the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania by striking out the word "steam-boats." I move it merely to take the sense of the committee upon the propriety of striking it out.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say a word before the vote is taken upon these amendments, in order that there may be a full understanding of this subject. The amendment I proposed has arisen out of the construction of the law which has been adopted by the court of at least one State of the Union, and its object is to adopt that construction as a matter of law, with a view of avoiding future litigation on that point; that is, that where a former law in its execution results in the fraction of a cent, it shall be considered as equivalent to a cent.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] offered a substitute relating to an entirely independent question, and which does not even embrace the object of my amendment; and I think, upon examination, it will be scarcely considered in order.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a point of order. This question of order was raised by the gentleman from Iowa and decided against him. He is now arguing an appeal from the decision of the Chair without taking an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that when the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa was presented the Chair supposed that it was offered as a proviso to section one hundred and three; and therefore he ruled the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in order, otherwise he would not have done so. The amendment being before the committee, it must be acted on.

The amendment to the substitute was not agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I wish merely to say one word, and for that purpose I move to amend by striking out the last word. This is an endeavor to change the form of taxation upon tonnage. It is now taxed two and a half per cent. upon the gross receipts, irrespective of net receipts. An instance was given yesterday, during the discussion, where a vessel earned $6,000 by a charter from the Government, and there was expended in repairs $6,500, leaving a net loss of $500; and still the Government obliged them to pay $150 revenue tax on the $6,000. I have a gentleman in my eye upon the other side of the House who had a vessel that went to California, and they there made him pay a tax on the gross receipts when the net receipts amounted to nothing at all, and instances are common where no revenue has been derived by the owners of vessels from the receipts for freights and yet a tax of two and a half per cent. on the gross receipts has been imposed. There is no other instance in the whole tax bill from the alpha to the omega where such gross injustice is done as is done in relation to this matter.

Sir, the shipping interests of the country do not wish to escape taxation, but they do wish to have the system changed and that you shall place your tax on tonnage; let it be ten, twenty, or thirty cents a ton, and let it apply to foreign tonnage as well as to domestic tonnage.

As the matter stands now, this tax simply applies to the coasting tonnage of the country, the foreign tonnage being exempt, and the coasting tonnage comes in competition with the provincial tonnage, so that it is a bounty, as it stands now, in favor of provincial tonnage and a discrimination against our own tonnage.

This proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] relieves our difficulties. It does not provide for a tax on tonnage, because that must come in in the tariff bill as that tax is collected at the custom-house. The Committee of Ways and Means assure me, however, that they are to bring in a bill which shall tax tonnage, eo nomine, so as to make our revenue certain.

At present, according to the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, if a man happens to have property enough that he may own the cargo as well as the vessel, he pays no tax, but if he has not property enough to own the cargo and vessel, and sends the vessel to seek freight, he is obliged to pay the tax. It is a discrimination against the poor owner and in favor of the rich owner, a discrimination in favor of foreign tonnage against American tonnage.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to say what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] designs to do hereafter, neither do I know what the House will do hereafter; but I am certainly prepared to say that the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] would work most obvious injustice to the great public works of the country. Throughout the northern country, a portion of which I have the honor to represent here, we have competing means of transportation between the railroads, the canals, and the inland waters, and it is known to all the business men of the North that the revenue to the individual or company derived from water transportation for the last two years has been very large and the business very lucrative. We who know anything about the railroads of the North know that they pay no dividends whatever, and hence there should be no discrimination between the tax to be levied upon persons who transport by water and companies that do this business by rail. This proposition, if adopted, will make a great discrimination against the railroad companies.

Mr. PIKE. I would remind the gentleman that canal-boats pay a tonnage duty while railroad cars pay no tonnage duty. You may put the duty on tonnage as high as it will bear, only put the tax in that form.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. That is very true, but I am discussing the proposition now before the House, and not the proposition which the gentleman from Maine, who is a truthful gentleman, says he shall bring before the House when some other bill comes up; because if I could trust, as I always would, my friend from Maine, of course I do not know what the opinion of this House may be.

We all know that the expenses of transportation by rail are quadruple those of transportation by water, and that when they come in competition the charges for railroad transportation are barely remunerative and often not remunerative prices, because they come in collision with cheap water navigation.

Now, I say that it would be obviously unjust for this House to adopt a proposition which will give to the water communications of the country the privilege of doing business without yielding a revenue to the Government, and impose the burden upon railroads, in which far greater amounts of capital have been expended, and where the revenues have been really, in our country, nothing at all to the stockholder from the day he subscribed for the stock until the present moment. It is true that these railroads have been the means of developing the resources of the country, and that the country has been made more prosperous and richer; but the people who have invested their money in them have not had it returned, and I believe they will not for the next twenty years. I go for doing justice to all interests, discriminating in favor of none. If the present tax on transportation is not enough, increase it. If two and a half per cent. is not enough, raise it to five per cent., and I will vote upon the proposition according to my own best judgment. I will vote to make all interests that go to develop the interests of the country equal, and will not discriminate in favor of any.

Mr. PIKE withdrew his amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. THAYER's amendment in the nature of a substitute; and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. KASSON's amendment; and it was adopted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That all officers in the military service of the United States below the rank of brigadier general shall be exempt from the income tax provided by this act or the acts to which this is an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that we had that question up the other day, and that then, on the suggestion of the chairman of the Military Committee, it was postponed, to be considered when reported from that committee.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is all very true. The Military Committee has agreed to report a bill containing a provision of this kind; but I greatly fear that the committee will not have an opportunity of reporting it or of having the action of Congress on it this session.

As this is a revenue bill it seems to me that it is the proper place to put in this provision. It seems to me that it is neither incongruous nor improper to determine in this bill whether these officers shall be subject to the income tax or not. It ought to be adopted. All officers below the grade of brigadier general should be exempt from this income tax—lieutenants, captains, majors, colonels, &c. Their pay is scarcely sufficient to maintain them. If we adopt this provision now, and have afterward an opportunity of passing upon the bill to be reported by the Committee on Military Affairs we can strike the provision out of that bill. If the sense of this committee be in favor of relieving these officers from the payment of income tax on their salaries it will take but a moment to have a vote upon it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs is to have the day as soon as this bill is disposed of. I hope we will dispose of it to-night. The chairman of the Military Committee is now absent at the War Department. I trust we will not put the provision in this bill.

Mr. ROSS. I suggest to my colleague [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that if his committee had reported back the bill which I had referred to it, to increase the compensation of officers, they could afford to pay this tax to the Government.

The question being on the amendment,

Mr. FARNSWORTH withdrew it.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend by inserting after the word "do" in the tenth section, the words, "under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury;" so that it will read:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all persons and every person who shall engage or be concerned in the business of a lottery dealer without having first obtained a license so to do, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall forfeit and pay a penalty of $1,000, to be assessed by the assessor of the proper district and collected as assessed taxes are collected.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the following as an additional section, immediately to follow section ten:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the capital of any State bank or banking association which has ceased or shall cease to exist, or which has been or shall be converted into a national bank, was intended to be and shall be assumed to be, for all the purposes of the act to which this is an amendment, the capital as it existed immediately before such bank ceased to exist or was converted as aforesaid.

It is perhaps not known that there is some difficulty about construing what the capital of a bank shall be considered to be for the purpose of taxation. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue holds that where a bank has been converted, inasmuch as it becomes a national instead of a State bank, it has no capital to be taxed; that its capital has ceased to exist; and therefore the notes which may be out are construed to be beyond the effect of the tax.

The amendment of Mr. STEVENS was adopted.

Mr. KASSON. I move, with the approval of my colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means, to strike out section eleven. It is believed that it will probably result adversely to the public interest, rather than as a benefit.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not in order, that section having been passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to move an additional section, that the provisions of section nine shall apply to manufacturers of domestic liquors.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order.

Mr. KASSON. The part in relation to photographs was passed over by consent of the committee. I move to strike out on page 19 the words, "by striking from the paragraph relating to photographs the words 'being copies of engravings or works of art, or,' and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

By inserting in the paragraph relating to photographs, after the words "being copies of engraving or works of art," the words "when the same are sold by the producer at wholesale at a price not exceeding ten cents, or are."

The amendment of Mr. KASSON was adopted.

Mr. ROSS. I would ask the attention of the committee to the paragraph on page 27, relating to section one hundred and seventeen. I think the word "county" should be inserted after the word "State," and before the words "and municipal taxes."

Mr. MORRILL. That is right.

Mr. ROSS. Then I make that motion.

The amendment of Mr. ROSS was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. There is one amendment I desire to offer; it was passed over by accident. I move the following amendment, to come in on page 34, at the end of line eighty-two:

By inserting before the word "injury" the word "accidental;" and by striking out the words, "while traveling;" also, strike out the word "by."

The amendment of Mr. MORRILL was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by inserting after section twelve, the following:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That whoever buys or sells gold bullion or coin for a price above the Mint value, whether to be paid for in legal-tender notes or in the notes of any bank, or individual, or in any other commodity, shall be deemed a bullion broker: Provided, That this section shall not apply to miners of the precious metals nor to persons purchasing gold or coin solely for the purpose of paying duties on imports, or for exportation, and who shall actually apply the same to one of those purposes without a resale.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That every bullion broker shall take out a license and pay $1,000 therefor, whether he operates at the brokers' board or elsewhere. Whoever deals in gold or coin, as above stated, without first having obtained such license, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and shall, besides, forfeit and pay the sum of $2,000, to be recovered in a qui tam action, the one half to go to the prosecutor and the other half to the United States. Whoever shall buy or sell gold or coin, or bargain to buy or sell the same at or for any price above the Mint value, whether such purchase or bargain be executed or not, each of the said parties shall pay a duty or tax of ten per cent. on the full amount or value of said purchase, sale, or bargain; and if the said bargain, purchase, or sale should be sold, assigned, or transferred to others, such assignor and assignees shall pay ten per cent. on the full amount of said transaction.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That every such sale or bargain to sell shall be deemed to be above the Mint value if more than one dollar in legal-tender notes or in the notes of any bank, company, or individual, shall be exacted, taken, paid, or received at less than one dollar in gold or coin.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That every bullion broker shall make out and return to the assessor of his district a full and true statement of all his transactions in gold or coin within twenty-four hours after such transactions shall have taken place; in default whereof he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall forfeit and pay the sum of $500 for each offense, to be recovered as provided for in the second section of this act, unless he shall have been unavoidably prevented from making such return.

Mr. Chairman, I think that this is a practical measure if it meets the approbation of this committee. It is simply a question of taxation upon transactions in a particular commodity, that is, gold. It proposes a tax upon all sales of gold where made for any purpose except exportation, or for the purpose of paying duties, or paying the interest on the public debt, where it is used by the party. It proposes to impose a tax of ten per cent. upon each purchase and sale. Now, it is well known that there are boards organized exclusively for operations in gold, where full records are kept. There is therefore no difficulty in getting this tax except the difficulty presented by dishonesty. The question is whether it is worth while to do it.

The other day, when I introduced the proposition, it was most keenly satirized by gentlemen of most excellent taste and unquestioned judgment in many matters.

I have received this morning, in answer to an inquiry, a letter from a gentleman who was formerly one of the Representatives of the State of New York in this House, a gentleman of great intelligence, who has taken great pains to investigate the subject, and he says that these transactions, which I propose to tax by this amendment, amount, including both parties, to $30,000,000 a day. A tax of ten per cent. on this amount would yield a revenue of $3,000,000 daily. These transactions are a fair subject of taxation. There remain, then, in my view, only two questions for the consideration of the House: first, whether the tax proposed is so heavy that it is likely to discourage this trade; and next, whether, if we do discourage the trade, we inflict any injury on the country.

My notions on this subject are well understood, and are deemed extreme by many gentlemen in this House, as well as by the gold operators. I have no doubt that, by concert among the gold gamblers, gold will to-morrow be run up ten or fifteen per cent., and then we shall be told to look at the alarming consequences of attempting to meddle with these transactions. But, as I believe, this trade in bullion constitutes a proper subject of taxation, and it is practicable to raise from it a very large revenue. It is for the House to say whether this tax shall be imposed.

Mr. MORRILL. For the purpose of terminating debate, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration, as a special order, the tax bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

AMENDMENTS TO ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a number of amendments to the enrollment act. I move that these amendments, together with the bill, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask unanimous consent to report from the select committee on the rebellious States a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 602) known as the reconstruction bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FRANK. I ask leave of absence for myself until Wednesday of next week.

Leave was granted.

EXTENSION OF DAY'S SESSION.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that the rule terminating the daily sessions at half past five o'clock be rescinded for this day in order that we may get the tax bill through the Committee of the Whole to-night.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

TAX BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill all debate on the concluding section of the amendments thereto be terminated in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 744, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, there were, on a division—ayes 40, noes 39; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. STEVENS and PENDLETON.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. A. MYERS. I move to amend by adding the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all crude petroleum or rock-oil that may be produced and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem; and all petroleum or rock-oil that may be in possession of the producers at the place of production, as aforesaid, shall be held and treated as if produced on that day; and the said duty shall be paid by the owner, agent, or superintendent of the well from which the petroleum or rock-oil has been produced within ten days after the time of rendering the account required to be rendered by law of petroleum or rock oil so chargeable with duty; and the said duty arising from the royalty or land interest to be a lien on such interest and its share of oil, and the duty arising from the working interest to be a lien on such interest and its share of oil, and on the well producing the same, with the buildings, fixtures, vessels, machinery, and tools, and on the lot or tract of land where the same may be, until the said duty shall be paid; and the person paying such duty, if other than the actual owner of said petroleum, shall have a lien on such petroleum for the repayment of the duties so advanced by him: Provided, That any person who shall produce petroleum or rock-oil, and use or refine the same without having paid the duty as aforesaid, shall, in addition to all other penalties and forfeitures, be liable to pay double the amount of duties as aforesaid thereon; and anything in this or any other act imposing a duty on crude petroleum or rock-oil, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the point of order, that having passed that part of the bill the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to add the following:

That hereafter, unless by special contract to the contrary, the instruments used by all inspectors and gaugers for the inspection and gauging of all high wines and domestic liquors throughout the United States shall be in all respects such as are or may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the inspection and gauging of spirits subject to duties throughout the United States; and a gallon shall be taken in all cases to be a gallon of first-proof, according to the standard set forth and declared for the inspection and gauging of spirits throughout the United States.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to add the following as an additional section:

That the privilege of purchasing supplies of goods imported from foreign countries for the use of the United States, duty free, which now does or hereafter shall exist by provision of law, shall be extended under such regulation as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe to all articles of domestic production which are subject to tax by the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I move to amend the proviso which reads "That coal tar and ammoniacal liquor produced in the manufacture of illuminating gas, and the products of the redistillation of coal tar thus produced shall be exempt from duty;" so that it will read as follows:

Provided, That coal tar and ammoniacal liquor produced in the manufacture of illuminating gas, and the products of the redistillation of coal tar, and the products of the manufacture of ammoniacal liquor thus produced shall be exempt from duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON moved the following amendment:

Add at the end of line two hundred and forty-seven the following words:

But one license fee of ten dollars shall be required from any one person, firm, or company in respect to all the business to be done by such person, firm, or company on a continuous route, and the payment of such license fee shall cover all business done upon such route by such person, firm, or company, anywhere in the United States; and such license fee shall be required only from the principal in such business, and not from any subordinate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the tax bill under consideration, and had directed him to report the same back, with sundry amendments.

Mr. MORRILL demanded the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, (at twenty minutes to six o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 18, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN LANAHAN, D. D., of Washington city.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, a report from the Commissary General of Subsistence, stating that he does not consider any increase in the quantity of the Army ration required for the comfort of the men or the efficiency of the service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of an act declaring slavery to be unconstitutional and criminal, and providing for the punishment of slaveholding as a criminal offense; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. RAMSEY presented resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of the payment of the "New Ulm Mill claims," being for labor and materials in building a mill at New Ulm, in 1862, by order of General Pope, commanding the military department of the Northwest; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for a repeal of the law taxing cigars, and that a tax may be imposed upon leaf tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWARD presented a memorial of Nicholas Thelen, praying that an appropriation may be made for the encouragement of silk culture in the northern and middle States, and that a superintendent may be appointed to direct and control the undertaking; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana, in favor of the improvement of the harbor of Michigan City, and recommending an appropriation for that purpose; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 455) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property, approved July 22, 1861,'" approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SPRAGUE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No.

356) for the purpose of checking contraband trade, and to provide a fund for indigent loyal refugees from the State of Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. SUMNER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal the act to incorporate the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating information in relation to agents employed in the payment of pensions, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, no further legislation being called for, in the judgment of the committee; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Evelina Porter, widow of Commodore David Porter, praying for arrears of pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 456) for the relief of the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company, of New York, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER, from the select committee on slavery and freedmen, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 443) to incorporate the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company, reported it with an amendment.

MEETING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution to print the compilation of the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States for fixing the terms of the meetings of Congress in extra session, prepared by the principal Clerk of the Senate, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the compilation of the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States for fixing the time of the meetings or sessions of Congress, and of the extra sessions of the Senate, and the practice under the same from the 4th of March, 1789, to the present time, prepared by the Chief Clerk of the Senate, be printed.

REVENUE COMMISSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom the subject was referred, to report back a joint resolution providing for the appointment of a commission on the subject of raising revenue by taxation. As a similar resolution was passed by the Senate at the close of the last session, I hope that by unanimous consent this resolution will be put on its passage at once and sent to the House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 115) providing for the appointment of a commission upon the subject of raising revenue by taxation was read twice by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, to inquire and report at the earliest practicable moment upon the subject of raising by taxation such revenue as may be necessary in order to supply the wants of the Government, having regard to and including the sources from which such revenue should be drawn, and the best and most efficient mode of raising the same; and such commission is to have power to take testimony in such manner and under such regulations as may be provided by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire of the chairman of the Finance Committee if he does not think it would be better to establish what shall be the rate of pay that shall be paid to these commissioners.

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolution as it is now prepared was drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury. That difficulty has been suggested, but it is very difficult to ascertain or state precisely what will be a reasonable pay. I can state, however, that if this resolution had become a law at the last session—it was passed here and sent to the House of Representatives, and met with a single objection, which defeated its passage—I believe it would have saved to the Government over a million dollars in the details of the present tax law; and I believe that is the judgment of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means. The reason why I have not inserted in the resolution any provision for the compensation of these commissioners is because it would create delay in its passage in the House of Representatives. All bills appropriating money must be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and that creates delay. I presume a very small expenditure, not over $10,000, will pay the expense of this commission for a year or two, and probably accomplish the purpose; and that provision may be inserted in any of the general appropriation bills.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, this is an important resolution in every view that can be taken of it. It would be useless to appoint such a commission as is proposed by this resolution unless after they had been appointed, had met and taken testimony, and presented their report, the report and recommendations they should make should be regarded as of so strong a character as to be heeded and to demand the most serious attention.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in regard to matters of revenue there is a very considerable want of accurate knowledge prevailing on this side of the continent touching those questions in the Territories and States bordering on the Pacific coast. A commission of this kind, therefore, should have at least one member of it selected from that country. The objects of taxation there are many; the amount of revenue that is now being received from those States and Territories is very large; and I therefore desire to add as an amendment the following proviso, to come in after the word "same":

Provided, That one of the said commissioners shall be selected from the Territories or States on the Pacific coast.

I make this suggestion, not simply to put a man in office, but that the peculiar condition of the industries of that country, as well as the sources of taxation, shall be made known and revealed to this commission when they shall take action. I think the Senate will understand and the chairman of the Finance Committee will concede the importance of this proposition. It may be said in reply that in the appointment of such a commission the Treasury Department will pay attention to this subject. If so, the provision will do no harm; but I desire that the States and Territories of the Pacific slope shall be guaranteed as well in the action that shall be taken, as that the Government shall have the information which can only be derived concerning our industries and country from one of our own people. I therefore move to insert the words:

Provided, That one of the said commissioners shall be selected from the Territories or States on the Pacific coast.

Mr. SHERMAN. I sincerely trust that a general proposition of this kind will not be incurred by an unusual provision limiting the power of appointment. The President or the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to make this commission. It will no doubt be carefully made, and with proper consideration for all the local interests of the country. I regard this measure, although simple in its phraseology, as one of the most important propositions affecting our revenue that can be offered, and therefore we ought not to limit, or restrain, or define the power of the President or the Secretary in forming this commission. The officers who will be appointed under this resolution, if it be adopted, as I think it will be without any objection, or scarcely any objection, in the other House, will perform the most important functions of any officers of the Government. If we had had such a commission at the commencement of our system of internal taxation we should have avoided a great deal of crude legislation. The tax bill will be passed to-day in the House of Representatives and will be sent to us, and we shall have but ten or twelve working days to consider it in the Committee on Finance and in the Senate. It will be impossible for us, in all the multitudinous duties imposed upon the Senate, to consider it with care. Three gentlemen taking up this whole subject, examining the financial systems of Great Britain and France and other countries which have maintained a large internal taxation, will be able to bring to the discharge of their duties an amount of reflection and care that we could not possibly bestow upon the subject.

I therefore do not think that this proposition, so important in its character, should be limited and restrained by any qualifications as to any locality. I have no doubt a gentleman from California may be found with all the requirements for such an office. I have no doubt such persons can be found in every State of the Union. But it is unusual, and I think improper, to limit or control the power of the Executive in selecting persons to constitute this commission.

I may say also that the State of California and the whole Pacific coast, although very important to our system of Government, will not pay in internal taxes probably one fiftieth of the aggregate of taxation levied upon the country. If we derive $4,000,000 from the Pacific coast, or even if we derive $10,000,000 from the Pacific coast—a much larger sum than we ever have or probably shall soon derive—it will be only one thirtieth part of the whole aggregate of internal taxation. Why, therefore, by law, compel the President in the selection of three commissioners, to take one from a region of country that will not pay more than one thirtieth part of our entire taxes?

But all these are considerations for the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, and I trust, therefore, that this resolution will not be incumbered by any such proposition. I might just as well, representing a portion of the great West, say that one of these commissioners should come from the interior region of the country; but I would not ask it because I think it is better to leave all these propositions of detail to the proper officers of the Government, who, I have no doubt, will discharge this duty well.

Mr. STEWART. I hope this amendment will prevail, and I believe gentlemen will think differently upon it after a little reflection. The Secretary of the Interior and the heads of the other Departments send out reports annually to the effect that the mineral resources of the country will be able not only to pay the interest but the principal of the national debt. There is a prevailing idea to that effect. The mode of getting at that, the mode by which it is to be accomplished, and how we are to pay the national debt, has not been suggested; or if suggested it has been suggested in the most obnoxious form. The whole country is constantly pointed to that region for supplies. It is impossible for a people situated as are the people on this side of the continent to understand the condition of things there. The people of the United States have not turned their attention to mining pursuits. You have no mining bureau; you have not even a mining committee; you have no mining colleges. You have to send to Europe for your mining engineers. You do not educate your young men to mining in this country at all. California and the Pacific coast are paying annually thousands of dollars for engineers from Europe to aid them and to direct them in developing the mineral resources of that region. It is a subject that cannot be investigated except by those who have given years of attention to it. Years of attention are required to understand it. They must have seen the country, they must understand how it is situated, before they can form any idea of it. If you get men from this side of the continent to make such a report as is proposed in this resolution, they will undoubtedly come in here with a proposition to sell the mineral lands, something arbitrary, something that will upset the whole condition of things there, because the prevailing idea here is that those lands should be sold. Now, I will right here make a few remarks with regard to the condition of things in that country.

Since the organization of the State government of California, about sixteen years ago, there have been probably eight hundred thousand miners on the Pacific coast. At least forty per cent. of these have died, and ten per cent. of the balance are disabled, and unable to work. We have to support them. They are supported, as it were, by the charity of those who do work. Twenty-five per cent. have gone into other pursuits; they have made a little money by mining and then left it. The other twenty-five per cent., or about two hundred and fifty thousand, are still there. There has been an average during the whole time of about two hundred and fifty thousand. Out of that two hundred and fifty thousand at least two hundred thousand are engaged in the unproductive business of hunting for mines, in attempting to develop the country. They have to labor against all manner of embarrassments, the want of transportation, want of title, the General Government continually saying that they will at some day sell those mines. Every obstacle is thrown in the way to discourage the development of the mines, not from any desire to injure our interests, but from a want of information, the want of such information as could be given by an intelligent gentleman representing the Pacific coast upon a commission of this character. They will need such information and counsel.

If we had means of transportation, if we had this question of title settled, if we had such encouragement as could be given to capital, if we had security to property, which the Government of the United States will be undoubtedly willing to give, we should be able to send you a stream of gold and silver, not of sixty million or seventy million per annum, but we should be able to send you from three hundred to five hundred million dollars per annum. How is this to be accomplished? Its effect upon the commerce of the country and its effect upon your debt is to be enormous; but if you pursue the policy recommended by the Departments here generally, you will close the mines. Levy your tax of five per cent. upon the gross proceeds of the mines; leave their titles still in chaos; leave them without transportation; treat them as a foreign and rejected community; break up their business; break up the present condition of things, and you will have no revenue from the Pacific coast.

Here is one of the great and leading interests of the country—an interest entirely misunderstood, misapprehended, throughout every department of the Government; and yet when we come here to expostulate we are told that universal rules must be applied; that we cannot be an exception. We do not ask to be an exception to the general rule; we are willing to come under it; but we do want a system which shall secure to us what we have for the last seventeen years developed. We want a system that will encourage miners hereafter to develop. Instead of two hundred thousand men engaged in prospecting the hills and traversing the deserts of the West, we want occupation for three or four million. We want to be able to give you a market. We want to be able to afford to the present generation some relief by reason of our mineral resources.

Suppose this commission, when organized, take the testimony of the heads of the various Departments here upon this question, what will they recommend?

Mr. CONNESS. The collection of a royalty.

Mr. STEWART. Yes, they will recommend the collection of a royalty; they will recommend levying upon us a tax of five or ten per cent. upon the gross proceeds of the mines. That has been recommended. We want to have that question investigated and understood, to see whether that is the best way to raise revenue. Last year you levied one half of one per cent. upon the proceeds of the mines, and you have lost money by it. I will pledge my honor to come here next winter with facts and figures and show you that the Government lost money by that tax; and I will show you now how it is very reasonable to suppose that it has lost money by that arrangement.

As I have said, there are two hundred thousand men who are working in unproductive mines. Those men, although working in unproductive mines, work by the day and get a little money, and then go out prospecting. They constantly pay a revenue to the Government in the way of tariffs, for we consume a great deal of foreign productions. They are useful, and are paying revenue. We come here to tell you the facts on this subject. The newspapers deceive you all. They only speak of one kind of luck. They never speak of bad luck; but in order to legislate you must have the facts. Out of the fifty thousand miners upon that coast who are producing the bullion that is creating and stimulating your commerce all over the world, and enabling you to have a metallic basis for the redemption of your bonds, only about one in five is making net gains. The others are going on in the hope that something may turn up for the better. They produce the great mass of the bullion at an expense in production equal to the whole production. They go along until they expend their means. They find something better and go into the class of the one tenth, or they go back into the great mass of prospectors. Now, if you put a tax of five per cent. upon the mill of a mining company that is producing $500,000 per year at an expense of $550,000, you stop them so much the quicker, and you cut off the possibility of their continuing until they get that mine developed so as to bring it into the paying class of mines, where there can be net dividends.

If you put a tax of five per cent. upon the proceeds of the mines on that coast, you destroy all the common ordinary paying mines at once; you knock out of existence four fifths of the productive enterprise of the country; and you discourage the two hundred thousand who are still hunting for gold; so that you take from them the reward that we have held out. The reward to them is an important circumstance. But for this reward, the hope of finding something, they could not afford to do it. The Government of the United States could not carry on this prospecting. It can only be done by those who are injured to it, and who are willing to gamble. Then you will cut off by a tax such as is advocated by all the heads of Departments here four fifths of the resources of that country and reduce the production one half. Suppose you reduce the production of the Pacific coast from an aggregate of seventy or eighty millions per annum to $40,000,000, and you get five per cent. on that. That is $2,000,000. How much do you lose? You lose one half of the present revenue; you lose three or four millions on the Pacific coast alone, besides destroying the commerce of the world and locking up the future prosperity of that country.

Now, in order to understand this great question, what ought to be done, in justice, for the development of that country? I say it is due that some gentleman of experience there shall bring before this commission his experience, that such rules may be provided that this great source of wealth may be opened to the people, and that the present generation may realize something from it. Boast not of your mines. It is the development and working of those mines that creates commerce and gives employment to men, and will make the country rich. But you can by a commission that is not informed on this question introduce a policy that will entirely annihilate the prospect of realizing anything from your mineral lands during the present age and until we shall become informed as a mining people. I do hope, in view of the great interest at stake, one of the leading interests of the country, that the chairman of the Committee on Finance will consent that one of the members of this commission shall be selected from that coast, who is familiar with the facts.

Mr. CLARK. This is certainly a very singular proposition from the Senator from California. I think it is the first instance in the history of legislation that we have attempted in this way to make a sectional appointment. I did not like the beginning of it. I still want to regard this country as a common country; and when a thing of this kind is to be done, I desire to give it to the appointing power without restriction, so that they may hold it as a common country. Suppose I should move to amend that amendment of the Senator from California by adding to it "and one from New England, and one from the middle States, and one from the great West." We raise a large amount of revenue from the manufacturers of New England. We raise a large amount of revenue from the incomes of New England. Why should we not have a commissioner from New England to look after those great interests?

Mr. CONNESS. You will have one.

Mr. CLARK. We shall have one, says the Senator from California. We shall, if we deserve to have one; and so will he.

Mr. CONNESS. I said "you will" have one; not "you shall."

Mr. CLARK. That is as I understood it; we shall have one if our interest demands it, and we find a good man there for it, and if we do not, we do not ask it. But the middle States will want one. They have a large variety of subjects of taxation. The House of Representatives, as I understand, propose to tax sales. The great commercial city of New York will say, "We have more sales in our city than all the rest of the country; give us a commissioner." Pennsylvania is developing her wealth in petroleum, and iron, and coal, and she will say, "Give us a commissioner." Then comes in the great West, and they will say, "We are the granary of the world; we supply the markets of the world with grain, and that is to be sold and we are to be taxed; give us a commissioner." I hope the Senators from the West will not say that I am at all invidious when I say that it is a great whisky-producing region also, and that great interest is not to be neglected; and we must have a commissioner for whisky.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did you say it was a great whisky-consuming country?

Mr. CLARK. No; I did not say that. I would not be so invidious. I know they ship and sell large quantities of it, and taxes are to be assessed upon it; and therefore they will want a commissioner to see that it is rightfully done, if we are to carry out the idea of the Senator from California.

I am not antagonistic to any interest of California. I desire, as much as the Senators from that coast can desire, that their great interest, to which they are looking for so much wealth, should be developed. I hope it will not be neglected by the Treasury or by the Government; and I have no idea that it will be neglected. It cannot be neglected. Wherever the gold is to be found, there will be the men to seek it; and whenever the Government interests are, there will be the Government to take care of those interests.

I do not desire that there should be any commissioner from New England, unless the best man is found there, nor from the middle States, nor from the West, nor from California; but where ever the best men are found, there let them be selected. But there is no necessity for taking one of these commissioners from California to represent the interests of California. You may find a man of broad and liberal views in some other State. These commissioners will have power to hear all the people from California if they will; they will have ample power to protect California; and I have no doubt they will desire to do it. They may take testimony from all California, and from Nevada too, that young giant who seems to come in here to grasp the land by degrees of latitude and longitude. They will all be protected where they should be protected. We are to look to them for aid; we are to look to them for counsel; but I desire that we should stand locked together, with no divisions even upon the statute-book between us that shall require a peremptory law that one of these commissioners shall be from that section. I desire that those Senators should trust in the East, I desire that the East should trust in the West and the Pacific slope; and that we shall be content to provide for the common country without any particular legislation of this kind, that in the appointment of a commission one of them shall be taken from that slope.

I have heard a great many times the argument offered here by the Senator from Nevada, that if you lay this tax and that tax upon this interest or that interest you will not get half so much revenue. The man that produces an article always says, "Tax it less, and we will produce more, and give you more money." The manufacturer will say, "Your tax will decrease manufactures; tax less, and your revenue will be larger in the aggregate." So will say the tobaccoist, "Make your tax small on tobacco, and more will be consumed." So will say the producer of whisky, "You have got your tax too high; you are diminishing the production; you do not get so much revenue as you would if you did not lay so large a tax." I say this is matter for adjustment; and it is a nice point, to be ascertained by a commission, or in some other way, what taxes can be imposed upon the different articles to give the most revenue with the least burden. That can be ascertained, in my judgment, without special legislation that we shall appoint one of these three commissioners from the Pacific slope. Has California been neglected?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, I think so.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator thinks so, and perhaps so thinks every section of the country of its own particular section; but there may be others who think she has been favored. I do not think she has been favored more than she deserves. I feel proud of that portion of the country. I want it to be developed; and I hope, if this resolution be passed and this commission be established, if the Secretary of the Treasury thinks the interest of that portion of the country or her particular employments demand it, she will have one of these commissioners; but I would not tie up the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and make it imperative upon him to take one of these commissioners from the East or from the West, from the Atlantic or the Pacific coast, from the North or the South. Let us leave it to him to judge of the whole broad country, and do what the whole broad country demands.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall not occupy much of the morning hour in the discussion of this subject, for I grudge it on my own account, as I desire to call up a bill, and am really sorry that so much of it has been consumed on a motion made by myself; but I cannot consent to have this matter closed without saying a few words in reply to the peculiar argument of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire.

The honorable Senator discovered in the amendment that I have had the honor to submit to this proposition what the directors of the United States Mint discovered last year in a bill to establish facilities for coinage in one of the Pacific States, a tendency to disintegration. He says he trusts that we will not begin to sectionalize the country, as this amendment proposes; and then he goes on to present the interests of New England, the interests of the West on this side of the Rocky mountains, the interests of the South, and then to speak specially of the interests of the Pacific slope, and to argue that there is not an existing reason, but a sectional reason, for the adoption of the amendment that I have proposed. Let me tell that Senator here, in behalf of the people whom I have the honor to represent, that there is no sectionalism in them; that they represent a broader nationality, a deeper and a more abiding love for our country, than even the constituency represented by the Senator from New Hampshire. Although they have been separated far and wide from the power of the national arm, by their love of country, without the arms of the Union they have preserved peace and nationality in that far-off country by the power of opinion and the readiness with which they have stood at all times for any conflict that was necessary to maintain the power of our Government there. Sir, the power of the Union has not been maintained on the Pacific coast by the arms of the Union. We have had there an enemy frowning in our faces, made up to a large extent of the vilest enemies of our country coming from the rebel States; but, sir, the sentiment of nationality in the breasts of a majority of those people was, and is, so strong that the Government has had to make but few expenditures and but few demonstrations of its power to preserve the most intense and devoted loyalty in California and on the Pacific slope. Let not the Senator say that there is sectionalism in a motion of this kind.

Mr. President, I made this motion because there is danger to the industries of that portion of the Union which we represent here. What is the danger? It is found in the annual reports of the Department which this resolution proposes shall appoint a commission to seek out sources of taxation, modes of taxation, to devise systems of taxation. Why, sir, the head of that Department in his last annual report recommends that what he calls a royalty shall be collected from our people and paid into the national Treasury. What does a royalty mean? It is based upon the theory that invests the sovereign power with the precious metals that are found in the earth, and as they own all, it belongs to that sovereignty to have a part, a tithe, if you please, of the proceeds, and hence a royalty. The Secretary of the Treasury—ay, in the year 1865—confesses that with all the light before him, with all the means at his command, with all his great ability, there has been discovered no means by which the mines of the United States, or belonging to the United States, have thus far paid what they should have paid into the national Treasury; and he confesses further that he knows of no measure by which the nation can be paid what belongs to it from that source, except by the collection of what he denominates a royalty.

Mr. President, I say here, individually, as one of the most devoted citizens of this Union, and as the representative in part of as loyal a constituency as there is in the Union, that it is not in the power of the Government to collect a royalty from the Pacific States. The very term is odious, and justly so. The industries of that people have grown up without encouragement from the Government. They have grown up without representation in the Executive Departments of this Government. They have no voice in the Cabinet Council of this Government. There is not a bureau here, no matter how small, that is represented from the Pacific coast. Nay, more than that, the common usage here is to pick up the lazzaroni of the East, the unemployed, and therefore the unworthy of the East, whenever an office of the Government in the West is open, and send them there, whether the office be an administrative or a judicial one. Why, sir, our courts have been filled with men selected in that way, who had neither legal ability, moral fitness, nor capacity, and who have gone into our western Territories and States to make our industries their sport and the object of their spoiliations. That has been done to such an extent that it has produced nearly a condition of revolution there. Nay, in one of our Territories, now a State, the people rose up en masse and compelled the judiciary thus selected to resign their office and leave the places they had so disgracefully filled. Such appointments have been wrung out of the Executive by the importunate friends of the incompetents, strangers to our country, and reckless of our interests.

And yet Senators say that the Pacific coast has not been neglected. More than once since I have had the honor to sit here I have called attention to that country. I confess, and I am proud to acknowledge, that I have found honorable Senators who have understood its great necessities. From the bottom of my heart I thank them, and feel grateful to them for the services they have rendered in protecting that gallant, fearless, and honest people in what properly belongs to them. They do not know the depth of love I feel in return for their assistance. But, sir, I have also found Senators and members of Executive Departments who, too disregardful of the voice of representation that came from that country, were not only unwilling to deal fairly with us, but unwilling to give us a hearing.

I trust, Mr. President, that this is coming to an end. I trust gentlemen on this side of the Rocky mountains are beginning to understand that there is a great and increasing interest and glory coming to our nation from the great West. The Senator from New Hampshire sees the beginning of a new secession in the simple amendment that I have had the honor to offer, that there might be one of this commission who would be able to state whether a tax of five per cent. upon the gross products of the mines, as proposed last year and passed by the House of Representatives, would be a tax fit to be imposed or not!

But the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance says we do not pay taxes. Why, sir, our small population pays $8,000,000 a year into the national Treasury on imports at the port of San Francisco.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say any such thing. The Senator must not misrepresent me in his excitement. I simply said that the whole Pacific slope at the best would not pay one thirtieth of the taxes. I said that if these three commissioners were to be appointed, it was not just or proper to say that they should come from any particular locality. And let me say to the Senator that a great deal of the declamation in which he has indulged is not pertinent. No man is more friendly to the Pacific coast, the mining interest, and the great mountain region of our country, than I am. I did not suppose that this proposition, which received the Senator's assent at the last session, and which passed the Senate without a single objection, would excite the slightest debate; but it seems to have given rise to a great deal of unnecessary excitement on the part of the Senator about his section and his State, which has not been arraigned, or anything said against it or about it, so far as I know, in the whole controversy.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not wish to misrepresent the Senator. The Senator certainly intended to say to the Senate that there was a little revenue from our portion of the country, and that, therefore, in point of fact and fairness, we would have no right to the appointment of one of these commissioners. I care nothing about the appointment; but the Senate will remember that since this movement was proposed last year, and since I permitted it to pass without any objection, this objectionable recommendation has been renewed by the Treasury Department. The Senator does not know what intense excitement and feeling these increased and renewed recommendations by the Executive Departments have made in the country that we represent here. The Senator does not feel it. I cannot blame the Senator.

The Senator alludes to my declamation. Mr. President, if the State of Ohio and its industries had been menaced as the State that I in part represent here was menaced last year, the Senator from Ohio would be the most excited man in this Chamber. But, sir, in what has been said perhaps our object has been partly, at least, accomplished. I have no confidence that if this commission is immediately appointed it will be one that will fairly represent our interests; and I undertake to say that here. I do not wish to persist in pressing this proposition upon the Senate; but I could not listen to the class of argument presented by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire without a response to it. I wish now to say that I will withdraw the amendment that I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from California withdraws the amendment.

Mr. McDougall. Mr. President, I trust that the sound of voices from the Pacific coast shall not be so voluminous and so continuous as to deafen the ears of the Senate. The proposition before the Senate is a simple one. It should have been adopted at the opening of the Congress in July, 1861. Such a commission was demanded then by the exigencies of the country. We should have selected then the most eminent ability and talent in this country or that we could derive from Europe to consider the grave question of deriving internal revenue. The chairman of the Committee on Finance knows very well that I urged that such a commission was advisable. So knows the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Cowan,] who was then on the Committee on Finance. If we had done so we should have derived much more revenue, and we should have had a system. I remember very well asking in the Committee on Finance whether any of the gentlemen of the committee had studied this question of internal revenue. It was a new question to us. None of the gentlemen on the Finance Committee had studied it. It required special investigation. It is known to the Senators who were members of the Finance Committee at that time that I proposed the appointment of such a commission. I asked for it then; I wish for it now. It will enable us to organize our system of revenue.

I have been told, and I think I am well informed, that our first internal revenue bill was based upon the old bill of 1813, which was a bill drafted before McCulloch and the persons interested in the subject in Great Britain had developed the system of internal revenue; and we have been going along on an imperfect basis all the time. A commission of three eminent men who understand finance—whether they come from California, or Maine, or Boston, is a matter of indifference to me—setting themselves to work in and about that business, will do more for us than any one of our separate armies in the field.

I trust the resolution will be passed as it is presented. I do not think it requires amendment. Let us give the authority to organize this commission, and set men at this work who will engage in it not merely from motives of patriotism, but from a high sense of patriotism and a love of high office in the true sense of high office—not office to be compensated for. Three such men selected would do what this Senate cannot do; what the House of Representatives cannot do; what we cannot do all together—for they will concentrate their force upon our finances, and give us a system, which we have not yet had. I trust that the resolution may be passed as presented. It is a thing that should have been passed long since.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "power" the words "to inquire into the manner and efficiency of the present and past method of collecting the internal revenue," directing their attention to the manner of collecting it, so that they may see how it can be collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. If there is no immediate necessity for passing the resolution, I wish it might be laid over and printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside if there be no objection, and the order to print will be made.

LUCY A. RICE.

Mr. HOWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 116) for the relief of Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, late of Richmond, Virginia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the Senate to consider the resolution now. I presume there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. The preamble declares that Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, late of Richmond, Virginia, by her courage and patriotic devotion in saving Colonel Streight and his party, and enabling them to make their escape from the hands of the rebels, has deserved well of the country; and the resolution therefore appropriates the sum of $1,500 to her, her heirs, or administrators.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time has arrived for the consideration of the special order, being the unfinished business of yesterday, and it is now before the Senate.

NAVY-YARD ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. ANTHONY. With the consent of the Senator from Ohio, I beg leave to make a report. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print two thousand extra copies of the report of the commissioners appointed to select a site for a navy-yard on the Mississippi, have directed me to report the same back without any recommendation. The printing of the report will cost about two hundred and thirty dollars, and the printing of the maps will cost $2,000. The Committee on Printing are not able to state whether it is desirable that the maps should be printed or not. There are Senators here who can answer that question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the report will be printed without the maps; and if it is in order I will move that the report be printed without the maps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is objection made to the present consideration of the resolution? Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; I do not object to its consideration, but I object to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ANTHONY. That will require an amendment of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate, and will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That two thousand extra copies of the report of the commissioners to report a proper site for a navy-yard on the Mississippi be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood the Senator from Ohio to move an amendment by inserting the words "without the maps."

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Illinois objected to it. I do not see any use in publishing the maps with that report. I am very anxious to have the report printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not very well advised about the report, but I suppose the maps are necessary, in the opinion of the commissioners at any rate, for a proper understanding of the report. The report is in reference to a matter of very great national importance, and these maps, I understand, will show the depth of water, bars, &c., connected with the sites which have been examined by this commission; and when Congress comes to act and locate this navy-yard, as I had hoped it would be able to do at the present session, we shall want these maps for a proper understanding of the whole subject. I have not been able to get hold of the report and read it and examine the maps, and cannot speak very advisedly; but inasmuch as the commission thought the maps necessary in their report I think we had better have the whole of it published. The expense, it seems, will be some two thousand dollars. That is a very small sum in connection with the great object which it is desired to accomplish. The Senator from Ohio appreciates that. I think we had better print the whole report, or else very likely when part of it is printed we shall have to call for the rest of it afterward.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection, except to the cost.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 385) to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War; and

A bill (S. No. 402) to repeal an act entitled "An act to remove the United States arsenal from the city of St. Louis, and to provide for the sale of the lands on which the same is located."

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 143) to facilitate the adjustment of certain accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of recaptured Africans in Liberia; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 112) for the relief of the heirs of Almond D. Fisk, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 392) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads;"

A bill (S. No. 413) to establish a bridge across the Ohio river at Cincinnati, Ohio, a post road;

A bill (S. No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 42) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road.

OBITUARIES ON SENATOR HICKS.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be published in pamphlet form, for the use of the Senate, two thousand copies of the addresses made by the members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives upon the occasion of the death of Hon. Thomas H. Hicks.

TOWN LOTS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the consent of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance to call up a bill which will excite no discussion. It has been reported favorably from the Committee on Public Lands, and will not occupy five minutes. It is Senate bill No. 380.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose it can be taken up informally, without displacing the special order.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 380) to give title to the occupants of lots in cities and towns in the State of California.

Mr. CONNESS. The Committee on Public Lands have reported the bill with an amendment in the form of a substitute. I suggest that the substitute only be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the original bill will be omitted, unless desired by some Senator.

The Secretary read the amendment of the committee, which was to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That in the case of any citizen of the United States who, at the passage of this act, may be in the business of bona fide actual coal mining on the public lands for purposes of commerce, such citizen, upon making proof satisfactory to the register and receiver to that effect, shall have the right to enter, according to legal subdivisions, a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, to embrace his improvements and mining premises, at the minimum price of twenty dollars per acre, fixed in the coal and town-property act of 1st July, 1864. Provided, That where the mining improvements and premises are on land surveyed at the passage of this act, a sworn declaratory statement descriptive of the tract and premises, showing also the extent and character of the improvements, shall be filed within six months from the date of this act; and proof and payment shall be made within one year from the date of such filing; but where such mining premises may be on lands hereafter to be surveyed, such declaratory statement shall be filed within three months from the return to the district land office of the official township plat, and proof and payment shall be made within one year from the date of such filing.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That in the case of any city or town which, at the passage of this act, may be existing on the public lands, in which the lots therein may be variant as to size from the limitation fixed in the said act of 1st July, 1864, and in which the lots and buildings as municipal improvements shall cover an area greater than six hundred and forty acres, such variance as to size of lots or excess in area shall prove no bar to such city or town claim, under said act of 1st July, 1864, effect to be given to this act according to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That where mineral veins are possessed, which possession is recognized by local authority, and to the extent so possessed and recognized, the title to town lots to be acquired shall be subject to such recognized possession and the necessary use thereof: Provided, however, That nothing contained herein shall be so construed as to recognize any color of title in possessors for mining purposes as against the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. As that is an important bill, and one which I know will give rise to debate from what I hear all around me, I feel it my duty to interpose an objection and to call for the special order. I hope we shall go on with the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think this bill will excite any debate. I propose simply, representing the Committee on Public Lands, to explain to the Senator its provisions, which will not occupy, I presume, four minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the order of the day, which is the Army bill. I think we should proceed with that, and get it out of the way, and I shall have no objection then to taking up this bill. The Army bill is the only bill I have charge of that I shall press upon the Senate at present, and then Senators can call up other bills in which they are interested.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senator from Ohio will allow my resolution to pass. It has been reported to the Senate and will lead to no debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not any more my duty to object than any other Senator; but I have charge of the Army appropriation bill, and I must press it upon the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. If it gives rise to debate, it can be laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order, being the unfinished business of yesterday, is now before the Senate.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

Mr. CHANDLER. House bill No. 307 was the special order for one o'clock to-day.

Mr. CONNESS. That was postponed until Monday last night.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the bill be postponed until Monday next at one o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour.

Mr. CONNESS. That has been done.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is mistaken. It has not been done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made unless—

Mr. TRUMBULL. That bill is not up.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will move to take it up for that purpose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope it will not be taken up and exclude everything else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot come up without postponing the special order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have been trying for a week to make some reports and to dispose of some business in my hands, and I shall never be able to do it if these special orders come up every day and cut off everything else.

Mr. CHANDLER. I gave notice that I would not antagonize this bill against the appropriation bills, and I give way to-day, and I hope the Senate will consent to replace the bill on the docket where it would have stood to-day but for the appropriation bill. I ask that the order making it a special order may be transferred to Monday at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be done.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move to postpone the pending and all prior orders and take up House bill No. 307, for the purpose of making it a special order.

Mr. SHERMAN. We can pass the Army bill in a short time, and then the motion will be just as much in order as it is now; and I will say to the Senator from Michigan, as I have interposed this bill in advance of his bill, that I shall feel bound to vote to take up his bill whenever he submits the motion at some other time; but now if we get up a controversy about the order of business the effect will be, I think, to delay both bills. We had better proceed with the Army bill now. It is the unfinished business, and overrides everything else.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose it is understood that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] has the floor on this bill and is prepared to make a speech upon it, and I hope the Senate will at least give him an opportunity in the morning hour on Monday to make his speech. I insist on my motion that all prior orders be postponed and that the Senate take up House bill No. 307.

Mr. CONNESS. If it is to consume the entire morning hour on Monday I shall vote against it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not the morning hour; I mean at one o'clock.

Mr. CONNESS. I understood the Senator to say the morning hour.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 307, to regulate commerce among the States.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 16, noes 14.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that that bill be postponed until Monday at one o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the honorable Senator will say Tuesday, because on Monday I desire to have some Indian bills considered that I have been trying to get up for a long time, and which will occupy perhaps an hour of the time of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope to get a vote on this bill on Monday.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is necessary that those bills should come up as soon as possible.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let them come up on Tuesday.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question whether this railroad in New Jersey shall continue to exercise the same powers it has exercised for thirty years is not a question of life and death; but there are some bills in relation to the Indian service and Indian affairs that must be passed. We must act upon them at once, or they will fail for this session. I have been struggling for some time to get an opportunity to bring them up. I ask the Senator from Michigan what great difference can it make with his bill whether it is considered on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. CHANDLER. What great difference does it make with the Senator's Indian bills whether they are considered on Monday or Tuesday?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It makes this difference: they will lead to no discussion, they will probably not occupy two hours, and this other bill will lead to discussion and may not be passed under three or four days; and then these bills have to go to the House of Representatives. Some of them are amendments to bills from the House. The bill the Senator from Michigan has charge of is a bill that has passed the House, and if it passes here it is not necessary to go back to the House. So the difference of one day is nothing to his bill. I will move to amend the Senator's motion by fixing it for Tuesday instead of Monday.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that bill will not be made a special order for either day. We are now within twelve days of the close of this session; there is very important business to be considered; and there has been no opportunity to consider it for some time in consequence of this bill which the Senator from Michigan has charge of, and another measure in the hands of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] There has not been an opportunity to make reports. The morning hour is consumed almost every day, and the general business of the country must all stop for the discussion upon these questions. At this stage of the session, I think, a bill that is to lead to an elaborate debate in which set speeches are to be made, a bill of the character of that which the Senator from Michigan has charge of, should not be pressed till the important legislation of the country, which must be acted upon at the present session, is considered. Then, if we have time enough, let us come here at night; I will come and sit with the Senator from Michigan and listen to the speeches that are to be made on that subject, and see if we can get to a vote upon it; but I think it is improper, and that the Senate ought not to agree to make it a special order to the exclusion of the other business of the Senate. I hope we shall vote against making it the special order for Monday, or any other day.

In addition to that, I wish to say that very little is gained by making it a special order. The Senator from Michigan knows very well that if it is made the special order for Monday a majority of the Senate may postpone it and take up any other measure. He had it made a special order for one o'clock to-day; and what has become of it? It is out of its place without any vote of the Senate. Why was it not called up at one o'clock to-day? Because another measure of which the Senator from Ohio has charge has precedence of it. If he makes it the special order for one o'clock on Monday, very likely this Army appropriation bill will be unfinished at that hour, and it may push it off again; and then the time of the Senate is taken up about the order of business, and making this measure a special order, as if time enough were not consumed in discussing the measure, but we must consume also a part of the day in determining at what hour we will have it up. I think it is injudicious to make special orders of any bills at this stage of the session. My experience is that it retards the business of the body. If we wish to get through with the public business and do the legislation that is incumbent upon us, I hope that we will make a special order of no bill. The Senate by a majority can always call up any bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator has given us a practical illustration of the truth of his remarks. He has occupied ten times the time I should have taken in making this special order. If it be true, as he says, that it will be displaced on Monday by the Army appropriation bill as the unfinished business, I shall make no opposition to that. What objection then can there be to making it a special order, and letting it be displaced by the unfinished business? I shall try on Monday to get a vote on this bill. I shall try to have a night session and finish it, and get it out of the way on Monday; and I hope that the Senate will stand by me and make it the special order that it may be finished and put out of the way. It is a very important bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the bill be postponed to and made the special order for Monday next, at one o'clock. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that it be postponed to and made the special order for Tuesday next, at one o'clock. The question will be first on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, that being the longest time.

Mr. BROWN. I understood when the Senator from Wisconsin made his motion and stated the reasons for it, that the Senator from Michigan assented to the agreement, and so intimated, by a bow of his head, that he would agree to the change and make this bill the special order for Tuesday. I know that the matters which are pending in the Indian Committee demand the instant attention of the Senate; that the interests that are there involved are not of a character that we shall be justified in deferring or laying over; and there is certainly nothing in this measure that cannot enable us to pass it over one, two, or three days at least. It is simply a cut-throat arrangement between two railroads who are trying to see which shall make the most money; and if we are to go to work and postpone the whole business of the nation in this time of war, with all these Indian tribes in our hands, suffering, and all the provisions that are necessary to be made for their safety, for legislation of this kind, I think we had better resign our seats and go home. I trust that the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the day be changed to Tuesday, and Monday assigned to Indian affairs, will prevail.

Mr. HALE. Is the motion divisible?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not, in the opinion of the Chair. It is in fact but one motion to make the bill the special order for a certain day.

Mr. HALE. The motion is to postpone it and make it the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is only the method of stating the question. It is in fact one motion to make it a special order.

Mr. HALE. Then I will not make a speech, further than to say that I entirely agree with the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope it will not be made a special order at all. It will not, in my opinion, hasten the action of the Senate on the bill. We shall constantly lose time, as we have been losing it now, in discussing the question of the order of business; and a special order at this period of the session is little better than a nuisance, let the bill be what it may. There are various bills before the body. I will not compare one with another with regard to the matter of importance; but I will say they are of great importance, and require prompt action. One of them is a bill to create a district and circuit court for the State of Nevada, commenced two days ago, which is the unfinished business of the morning hour, upon which the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] has the floor, his speech having been cut short by the special order intervening and cutting off further discussion on that subject. Then there is the bankrupt bill, which has been on the table for nearly a fortnight, from the Committee on the Judiciary, and which I have been watching a favorable opportunity to ask action upon from the day it was reported until to-day, without the least possible hope of getting it taken up. That is a very important question. The country is interested in it. It has passed the House of Representatives. I should desire greatly to make that a special order, if there was a probability that by so doing I could hasten action upon it. But I see no hope of it. With these and like bills alluded to by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Wisconsin pending, I shall vote against making any bill, no matter how important, a special order.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate will now see that it is scarcely worth while to continue a discussion about special orders in the future. I therefore move that the pending bill be postponed, with a view to take up the Army appropriation bill. The Senator from Michigan will be just as well off by now taking up the Army bill, as he will have an opportunity on Monday to move to take up his bill, when a majority can decide it; but now two thirds is required to make it a special order. I am satisfied that we only waste time in this sort of discussion; and I trust, therefore, that we shall proceed to the consideration of the Army bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that is done I wish to call attention to another measure on which the Senate has not voted, and which has been under consideration several days. I mean the report of the conference committee on the Freedmen's Bureau bill. The Senator from Connecticut has reminded us of the bill on the table known as the bankrupt bill, which has never been acted on at all. He proposes to press that on the attention of the Senate. I think we had better proceed with business according to a certain order and finish what we commence. The Senate has already commenced the consideration of the bill of my friend, the Senator from Michigan, relating to the New Jersey railways. It has also commenced the consideration of the report of the conference committee on the Freedmen's Bureau. I think it would be better economy of our time to proceed with the consideration of those measures and finish them before we take up the bills of my friend from Wisconsin, known as the Indian bills, or the bankrupt bill, which is in charge of my friend from Connecticut. I am in favor of the bankrupt bill; I am in favor of the measures in charge of my friend from Wisconsin; but I do not think that the time of the Senate will be saved if we push either of those measures against business on which the Senate has already entered.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator will pardon me, I have not pushed the bill, and did not propose to push it. I alluded to it as one that I was desirous to bring forward at the earliest moment; one that was important, and that these special orders interfered with, I thought, improperly.

Mr. DAVIS. "Monsieur Tonson come again." [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. That is you, is it?

Mr. DAVIS. A spectator might inquire whether that exclamation referred to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts or to myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. I think it must be the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. Or the Freedmen's Bureau bill. Now, Mr. President, I wish from the bottom of my heart that that bill and the subject to which it refers, without including the Senator from Massachusetts or myself, was in the sleep that knows no waking. I trust that his freedmen's bill will not be made a special order at this late period of the session. Let it take its chances. I would prefer that it should be postponed till the day of judgment; but if it cannot be postponed that length of time, at any rate, that it be carried, not into the middle of next week, but into the middle of the next session of Congress, and that we hear no more of it at this session.

Mr. SUMNER. I can tell the Senator that he will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment to strike out the following proviso at the end of the bill:

Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be used for the purpose of paying any railway company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States, when such company may have accepted a grant of lands from Congress upon condition of furnishing said transportation free of toll or other charge, except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a question of considerable magnitude, upon which there will probably be a difference between the two Houses, and it is better for us to understand it before we vote upon it. If I can obtain the attention of the Senate I will explain it very briefly.

By the land grant to the State of Illinois for the construction of the Illinois railroad, it was provided, referring to the lands granted by that act:

"That the said lands hereby granted to the said State shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof for the purposes aforesaid, and no other; and the said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States."

This provision was afterward inserted in all the land grants made by the Congress of the United States to the various States for the construction of railroads, and the same provision is contained in the grants for canals and other purposes. When the war broke out, a controversy arose between the Government of the United States and the land-grant roads, as they are called, as to whether the companies were bound to transport men and munitions of war for the Government free of expense. The companies contended that while this grant made their roads public highways, which the Government had a right to use as public highways free of tolls, yet they had the right to ask of the Government sufficient at least to pay the running expenses of the road, and they were not bound under the terms and conditions of this grant to transport men and munitions of war without pay. This controversy continued for some time, until finally an arrangement was made between the Government of the United States and the Illinois Central railroad, which is the principal road interested, by which the Government pays to these railroads two thirds of the allowance made to other railroads. By an agreement made between the various railroads in the country and the United States, the railroads were to receive two cents per mile for each soldier carried, and a certain rate of transportation. An allowance was made to the land-grant roads, as they were called, of two thirds the allowance to other roads. Sixty-six and two thirds per cent. of that allowance was paid to the various land-grant railroads for the use of their cars, and for the use of the men employed upon them, and for the use of machinery. The other third was reserved for what are called the tolls or benefits reserved under the land grant. This arrangement has been continued from 1861 to this time. The whole of it exists in a letter, a copy of which I propose to read:

WAR DEPARTMENT, August 15, 1861.

SIR: Upon consultation with the Quartermaster General it has been decided by this Department that the clause in your charter, section four, gives a clear right to the Government of the United States to the use of your roadway, without compensation, for the transportation of its troops and its property. As a proper compensation for motive power, cars, and all other facilities incident to transportation, two cents per mile will be allowed for passenger travel, subject to a discount of thirty-three and one third per cent. as due to Government for charter privileges.

Payment for transportation of freights, stores, munitions of war, and other public property, will be made at such reasonable rates as may be allowed to other railroad companies, subject, however, to the abatement of thirty-three and one third per cent., as before specified.

The foregoing basis has been arranged with the distinct understanding that transportation shall be furnished by your company at such times and in such manner as the Government of the United States may require, and that preference shall be given to Government transportation in accordance with the requisitions of this Department and of its officers.

If this proposition is acceptable to your company, notice in writing to that effect will be expected within ten days from this date.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SIMON CAMERON,

Secretary of War.

W. H. OSBORNE, Esq., President Illinois Central Railroad.

That proposition was accepted, in these words:

OFFICE OF THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY,
NEW YORK, August 17, 1861.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your communication of the 15th, containing the determination of the Government in relation to the use of the railroad of this company.

Under present circumstances, an important part of our line is imperiled; an active co-operation with the Government is indispensable, and I beg to notify you that the proposition of the Government is accepted.

The company will endeavor to forward the troops and property with the utmost promptitude, preference always being given as indicated.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. H. OSBORNE,

President.

Hon. SIMON CAMERON, Secretary of War.

By this arrangement the Government of the United States paid to the land-grant roads two thirds of the price stipulated to be paid to other railroads, reserving one third for the tolls, &c., provided for by the grant. This arrangement was continued, it seems, without any material objection until the present time. The House of Representatives, however, have inserted the following proviso in this bill:

That no money appropriated by this act shall be used for the purpose of paying any railway company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States, when such company may have accepted a grant of lands from Congress upon condition of furnishing said transportation free of toll or other charge, except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress.

When this proviso came to the Committee on Finance, we sent to the Department and have received copies of the contract entered into between the Illinois Central railroad and the Government, and we also called for the views of the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster General on the subject. The Secretary of War says, in substance, that this arrangement was in existence when he came into the Department; that he examined the subject, and he believed it wise to continue the arrangement. He said that if the Government should refuse to pay anything to the Illinois Central railroad, which it employed very much indeed, and the other land-grant railroads, the effect would be to stop the running of those roads, and to compel the Government of the United States, under the powers granted to it by Congress, to seize and run the railroads on the Government account. The Secretary, I think very properly, says, that any attempt to run a railroad by the Government on Government account would involve the Government in a much larger expense than the arrangement made by his predecessor

He says, however, he has paid the Illinois Central Company no money under this arrangement except under protest, reserving the right to recover it back according to the process of the common law, as money received without authority. He says, whether it is worth while to reserve this reservation or not is for Congress to determine; but at any rate, he says, the refusal of the Government to make them an allowance at least for their running expenses, will be substantially to compel the Government of the United States to run all these railroads; a consummation that he wishes to avoid. We have also a letter from the Quartermaster General to the same effect. I think the officers of the Government have endeavored to protect the interests of the Government in this arrangement; and after the most careful consideration we could give to it, we were of the opinion that it would be unwise for Congress by a proviso to an appropriation bill to disturb this arrangement, and therefore we propose to strike it out. I have got a number of documents and papers here on the subject, which I will not read to the Senate unless further information is desired. I believe that finally the committee were unanimously of the opinion that it was wise to strike out this provision.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you offer any substitute for it?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. I will state another thing in regard to the railroads in Missouri. Congress have already relieved them from this stipulation by authorizing the Secretary of War to pay them the ordinary rates paid to other railroad companies. The ground of this action by Congress was that those roads had been so much interfered with and destroyed by the public enemy that it was impossible to continue running them unless the Government would pay the ordinary transportation. That arrangement has been carried into effect by the War Department; but as against the other railroads, such as the Iowa, Minnesota, Illinois, and Michigan roads, the plan has been to give to them two thirds of the ordinary allowance. We are satisfied that all these roads with the exception of the Illinois Central, would be destroyed and stopped if the Government should insist upon not paying them anything, and yet use them whenever they desired for the transportation of troops and munitions of war.

The Illinois Central railroad, however, is peculiar in this particular. It is a powerful corporation, having a grant infinitely greater than any other grant ever given by the Government to a railroad; a grant of land which I believe is now worth $17,000,000. I suppose the Illinois Central railroad might conduct their operations and might carry on their business if the Government should refuse to pay them anything. The officers of the road say they cannot. The War Department think they can; but the probability is that it would be a substantial destruction of their franchise; that the Government transportation which is fully equal to one third of the whole transportation over the road, would use up and consume all the profits of the road; and it would require all that could be received from private individuals from transportation to pay the ordinary expenses of the road. My impression is that the effect would be to compel the Government of the United States, in order to secure transportation over that great line of travel, to seize the road and run it on its own account, and the result of that would be injurious to the public service.

By adopting the suggestion of the Committee on Finance, and striking out this proviso, it leaves the question precisely where the War Department have left it. The United States have the right to test the question at any time by refusing to pay this money, or by suing in the courts to recover it back. We thought it very unwise to burden and embarrass an appropriation bill; an appropriation bill for the support of the Army, containing only appropriations for the support of the Army, involving some $511,000,000, by a provision involving a controverted question of law, and involving a contract which has been acquiesced in by both parties for something like four years; which has been carried out by both parties in good faith. It seemed to us unwise by a provision attached to an appropriation bill to break up this contract without very grave consideration.

I can say further that this matter is now before the Committee on Military Affairs, where they can more maturely consider it, and report any bill that is necessary to preserve the public interests. It is manifest that if this proviso should be adopted in the words sent to us by the House it would destroy all the western railroads, commonly called land-grant railroads, except the Illinois Central, and that that road, although a very powerful corporation, would scarcely be able to stagger under the load.

Complaint has been made to the Committee on Finance that the Illinois Central Railroad Company have abused the privileges granted to them by the law; that they have raised the price of transporting passengers to seven cents a mile, and have unreasonably raised the price of transporting the produce of the farmers of the country. That question we could not go into. If, as has been stated, that road charges seven cents a mile for transporting passengers it is certainly unreasonable, and there certainly ought to be some way to protect the Government and the citizens of Illinois and the whole country from such unreasonable and improper conduct.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are not the tolls limited?

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems the tolls are not limited. I do not know whether that is so or not. We did not examine into that question, because we considered that we had nothing to do with it. The reason why this proviso was attached, I have no doubt, was because this corporation, a great and powerful one, in the opinion at least of one Representative in the House of Representatives who lives on the line of the road, and in the opinion of many citizens, have abused the franchise granted to them by the State of Illinois. This was a question the State of Illinois was better able to manage than we. It is said that the State of Illinois in granting the lands to the Illinois Central railroad neglected to limit the price of transportation and passengers. If so, it was a very great error. The Government of the United States has certainly made a reasonable bargain to protect its own interests.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether it is very clear that under the grants made to these several railroads, including the Illinois Central, they were to carry the troops and munitions of war of the United States free of charge. In looking at the particular clause of the grant which is supposed to create that obligation, it does not appear to me to be perfectly certain that that is the correct interpretation of the grant. But assuming it to be so, I am at a loss to know by what authority the Secretary of War has entered into an engagement to pay to these companies that compensation which he promised; and as I understand the Senator to say that he has paid it under protest, the object of that protest being to place the United States in the condition in which they can recover the money back hereafter, it seems to me to be desirable that we should guard against what would be an implication, perhaps, in the courts, by striking out this proviso, that we had no objection at all to that arrangement. The case will then be in this situation: the United States may waive, if they think proper, their right to use these roads free of expense, and the Secretary has attempted to do it in point of fact. He agrees to pay a certain amount of compensation, and that he has paid or is in the process of paying. He says he makes the payment under protest; but the matter is brought before Congress, and a proposition is made to take from him the right to continue that engagement, and make it his obligation to recover the money back, and Congress strikes out that provision. Now, it seems to me the inference will be that in point of law the Congress of the nation have assented to that arrangement; and if so, although there was no authority upon the part of the Secretary to make the arrangement, because it was the obligation of the company to carry the troops and munitions of war free of expense, the company may hereafter, perhaps successfully, rely upon the principle that Congress has itself sanctioned it by refusing to interfere with it. I submit that question to the honorable member, whether it is necessary to do it in this bill or in some other bill, is a matter, perhaps, that admits of some doubt. I asked the honorable chairman whether he proposed any substitute for this proviso. I do not know that any substitute could be proposed, the object being to get clear of the proviso; but in some form or other, either in this bill or in some other bill, if we mean to maintain our right to use these roads free of expense and to retain the right to recover back all the money that has been already paid, or may hereafter be paid, we had better exclude the inference that we have assented to this arrangement.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance did not undertake to decide definitely the legal action involved. Perhaps a brief statement of the legislation of Congress on this subject will be the clearest opinion that I can express.

As early as 1819 Congress granted to turnpike companies public land to aid in building roads; and this very same language was used in making the grants to turnpike companies, reserving to the Government of the United States the right to go over those roads free of toll. As a matter of course, from the very nature of the improvement, that would not compel the turnpike companies to carry the servants and property of the United States over the roads, but simply to allow them to pass over toll free. When we came to grant lands to canal companies the very same words were used; that is, the Government of the United States had the right to use the canal free of toll. No one would claim that this would compel the canal company to furnish the canal-boats to transport the property and soldiers of the United States; because the boats in the one case, and the carriages or stages in the other, are, from the very nature of the company, owned by some one else, and not by the company.

The trouble was, when Mr. Douglas—for I presume he framed the first law on the subject of land grants to railroads—framed the law granting lands to the State of Illinois, or the Illinois Central railroad, he used the same language in regard to railroads that had been used in turnpike and canal charters; but as railroad companies always use their own carriages and drive their own locomotives it raised the question whether or not more was reserved as against a railroad than was reserved as against a canal or a turnpike company. To give to the United States a right of way over a railroad, and nothing else, is an absurdity; because if the United States should attempt to run its cars over that railroad, and other people had the right to run their cars for hire over the road, as a matter of course collisions would be unavoidable, and the destruction of the road would follow.

This was a controverted point, which was argued at considerable length by the attorneys of the railroad. I hold in my hand a report made by a very excellent lawyer, who was a member of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, Mr. Porter, of Indianapolis, in which he comes to the conclusion that the railroad companies were bound to carry in their cars the property of the United States, on the ground that the United States could have no benefit from the reservation of the charter unless that was the intention of the Legislature. That is his ground. We have arguments pro and con.

But the Secretary of War, when he made the arrangement in August, 1861, came to a different conclusion. He drew a distinction between the right of way and the use of the carriages and servants of the railroad company, and he allowed sixty-six and two thirds per cent. for the use of the carriages, the rolling stock, and the servants of the railroad, and deducted thirty-three per cent. for the right of way. This is the arrangement that has been made and continued from that time to this. There has been no definite judicial decision about it. It is a legal question upon which a good deal may be said. The difficulty grows out of the faulty legislation of Congress in using the same language in regard to a railroad that had been previously used in regard to a canal, or a turnpike company, or any other highway, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Cowan] suggests.

Under these circumstances the Committee on Finance thought it unwise and inexpedient for us to legislate on this legal question, involving the use of nearly three thousand miles of railway, on an appropriation bill. By striking out this proviso we simply leave the contract to stand where it now stands. The United States undoubtedly will have the right to sue for and recover back this money if the company was bound to transport the troops and munitions of war of the United States free of expense. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] shakes his head.

If the company was bound to transport the men and munitions of the Government, and, as a condition for transporting them, exacted from the Government this money, it seems to me the United States might recover it back. But if there is any desire on the part of any Senator to reserve to the United States this right, I have not the slightest objection to it. When you come to draw such a provision you will find it very difficult to accomplish your purpose.

On the whole, the Committee on Finance thought, considering that this was the Army appropriation bill, that we ought to strike out this proviso, as not being germane or pertinent to the matter of the bill, and that we ought not by such a provision to interfere with the operations of the Government acquiesced in now for some three or four years, under which the Illinois Central railroad have carried hundreds of thousands of our soldiers, and thousands of tons of our transportation, and for which they have received, I believe, a million dollars—I do not state it precisely—and are entitled at this moment under the contract to receive in the neighborhood of half a million more.

The question is of very little importance when applied to any other railroad, because to enforce the rigid rule claimed upon other railroads would be to absolutely destroy them. There is no doubt that the land grants to the other railroads are not to be compared in value to the burden this restriction would be upon them; and it would be far better for them to surrender to the Government of the United States all their land grants than to hold those lands subject to the restrictions of the bill construed as it is now proposed.

But in regard to the Illinois Central railroad it is very different. Owing to the rapid improvement of the State of Illinois, the rapid development of that country, and the enormous value of the lands, the land grant to the Illinois Central railroad is estimated at from fifteen to thirty million dollars; and perhaps they are able and could carry during this war the men and munitions of war of the Government without charge.

It is to be remembered, too, that when this grant was made Congress could not have contemplated such a state of affairs as that in which we are now involved. If this only applied to the old regular Army, to the transportation of a few thousand, or ten thousand, or twenty thousand, or even one hundred thousand men, it would be very different; but it could not have been within the contemplation of Congress at the time this provision was made that this corporation should be required to transport half a million men, as I have no doubt they have done during the operations of this war. That is a ground, it is true, that does not affect the legal question, the legal obligation to carry these men and munitions of war free of charge; but it is a very equitable consideration, which Congress would be bound to consider, and which was considered by the Secretary of War when he made the arrangement in August, 1861.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the motion now before the Senate is to strike out the proviso at the end of the bill which is now under discussion. That proviso declares—

That no money appropriated by this act shall be used for the purpose of paying any railway company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States, when such company may have accepted a grant of land from Congress upon condition of furnishing said transportation free of toll or other charge, except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress.

This proviso, I suppose, was inserted in the bill by the House of Representatives for the purpose of foreclosing and stopping any further payments being made to this description of railroads by the Secretary of War, inasmuch as he has heretofore paid out large sums of money to railroad companies which have been aided by the land grants heretofore made by Congress. It is said that this would leave matters in statu quo; and I suppose some gentlemen may expect that if these payments by the Secretary of War were not authorized by the statute, they may be recovered back again in an action for money had and received, or in some appropriate form of action. I do not suppose so. If the money thus paid out by the Secretary of War has been paid voluntarily, without coercion, without fraud, and with a full knowledge both of the facts and of the law relating to the case, it is impossible that in any court of law or equity there can be a recovery of the money paid. The person holding the money would be entitled to continue to hold it upon the ground that it was a voluntary payment by the United States. Such I understand to be the law of the case.

The main question arising on this motion is one involving the just and true interpretation of the acts of Congress heretofore passed making appropriations of land to such companies. In the case of the Illinois Central railroad, and in all cases of land grants to railway companies in my own State, and I dare say in grants made in other States, the following is the language employed by Congress:

"That the said lands hereby granted to the said State shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof for the purposes aforesaid, and no other, and the said railroads shall be and remain public highways for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States."

In interpreting a statute we are bound to look carefully to the subject-matter to which it relates, and to construe it with reference to the natural objects and purposes of that subject-matter. It is idle to pretend in reference to a railroad that it can be worked, or that cars can be run and employed upon it, by any third person. The universal practice, I believe, is that the corporation itself uses and runs the cars; because, as has been very properly remarked by the Senator from Ohio, if other persons were allowed to introduce cars upon their railroad tracks and to run them, collisions would ensue, and the very object which the public had in view in granting the charter would be defeated by the confusion thus created. When this statute was passed, undoubtedly it was in the mind of Congress, it was a part of the intention of the Legislature, that this transportation mentioned in the clause should be carried on and perfected by the respective companies themselves. Was it intended that the United States, whenever they wished to transport property over one of these roads, might be at the trouble of purchasing or building their own cars, introducing them upon the track, manning and equipping them in their own way, and running according to their own time and in their own manner? Was this intended? Is it possible that Congress entertained an intention so absurd and so self-destructive as this would seem to be? It seems to me it is impossible to entertain any such idea. If, then, it was the intention of Congress, in speaking of transportation upon these roads, that the word "transportation" should be used in its ordinary and common acceptance, it follows logically that it was the intention of Congress that the company performing the act of transportation should be restrained forever from imposing any tax or any charge upon the transportation. The language is:

"The said railroad shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States."

And it seems to me too plain for argument that this transportation thus performed for the United States was to be performed by the company in the same way that they perform transportation for any other customer. If, therefore, I am right in this interpretation of the clause, it follows clearly enough, does it not, sir, that the company is restrained from imposing any toll or any charge whatever as against the United States for the transportation of their property or troops upon this road. I venture the surmise that had the idea been started in discussion at the time this law was under discussion in Congress, that the whole privilege thus granted to the United States was to employ their own cars upon the roads that might be constructed by these land grants, and that the sole exemption which they could claim was an exemption from the payment of the cost of rolling the cars over the road, these statutes would never have been passed. What is the exemption according to the other construction? Why, plainly this, that the United States shall not be charged anything for running and rolling its cars over the iron tracks that are laid by the company; and that that is the whole extent of the exemption. I confess that that, to my mind, is a very unfair and a very unnatural interpretation to give to the language. It possibly would bear that interpretation, but it leads to an absurd result, to an absurd conclusion; and you are not at liberty to take that interpretation which leads to an absurd conclusion, or which tends to defeat what was manifestly the intention of the Legislature. I therefore hope that this clause will not be stricken out, but that it will be retained.

Mr. COWAN. I move to amend this proviso by striking out the word "no" in the one hundred and fifty-third line, and after the word "act" in that line, inserting the words "or any other act;" and in the one hundred and fifty-fourth line by striking out the words "shall be," and to insert the word "and;" and in line one hundred and fifty-eight, after the word "charge" by striking out the words, "except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress," and inserting in lieu thereof the following words:

Shall be subject to future adjustment between the United States and said company, it not being intended to admit the right of said companies to compensation for such transportation.

The proviso will then read, as I propose to modify it:

Provided, That money appropriated by this act or any other act, and used for the purpose of paying any railway company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States, when such company may have accepted a grant of lands from Congress upon condition of furnishing said transportation free of toll or other charge, shall be subject to future adjustment between the United States and said company, it not being intended to admit the right of said companies to compensation for such transportation.

I think this will obviate all the difficulties that have been suggested. It was not thought best by the Committee on Finance to compel these companies to perform specifically the contract which it was believed by the committee they had made for the transportation of these troops; that that perhaps will be to injure ourselves more than the companies; but to go on paying them as we have been paying them for the purpose of enabling the companies to keep themselves on foot, carrying our troops and munitions of war, and reserve to ourselves the right hereafter to insist upon an equitable adjustment of the claims. In the case of a railroad company that had received large and very valuable grants of land, and which will find itself rich after the war, it would be but fair that they should account to the Government for this money advanced to them in the present crisis. This amendment will save to the Government of the United States the right to have that adjustment.

Mr. WILSON. I am disposed to strike out the entire proviso of the House of Representatives and to put nothing in its place. I am disposed to do so for this simple reason: I think if it is understood that the Government of the United States intends to require these railroads to perform these duties and make them no compensation, the tendency will be to break down all the small and new land-grant railroads and to prevent their being finished. The Illinois Central railroad can stand this legislation; but I apprehend this reservation in Congress that we are to demand this work and pay nothing for it will prevent the roads in Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, and other portions of the country, that have received land grants and are not yet completed, the roads that are in the market for means to finish them, from being finished, to the injury of those States and to the injury of the whole country. This matter of land grants, I think, stands something in this way: I hold that the public lands of the United States, although purchased by the Government of the country, are for the benefit of the people who live in those new States, the people who go there and take up those lands and cultivate them; and I am always disposed in the management of the public lands to act upon that idea. The benefit the old States receive from the public lands arises from their settlement, opening markets for what they produce, and having the new lands raise agricultural products for their benefit.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator will allow me to suggest to him that the Government also receives a double price for the reserved sections.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly. Acting upon that theory, I have ever been in favor of land grants to railroads for the purpose of developing that portion of our common country. We usually make these grants where the lands are really of no value to us, lands that are far away from the rivers and from the lines of travel, lands that are difficult to reach or bring into market. We make a grant of land to a railway to run through these vast spaces of territory. We double the price of what we reserve. We give away one half of our land to a railway and we double the price of the balance, and we sell it much faster than we should if we had made no grant at all.

Mr. COWAN. I will ask the honorable Senator whether that is not an argument in the case of making a contract; but here is a contract already made. Take the Illinois Central railroad, for instance. She has carried, say $2,000,000 worth for the Government of the United States, and if she has had $20,000,000 of surplus lands given her as a consideration for that very carriage I suggest whether, after the war is over, it would not be fair that she should account for it.

Mr. WILSON. I will come to that in a moment. Take the case of this great Illinois Central railroad. We made a grant to them of a large amount of land. I think we had nine million acres of land there when we made the grant. We granted to them something over two million. Within a very short time we were enabled to bring the balance of our lands into market, when but for that grant we should not have sold them for years, and we have received the benefit arising from their sale. The Government sold those lands for vastly more than they would have sold for if they had not made that grant to the State of Illinois for this railroad. It was a great thing for the State of Illinois; it was a great thing for the Government of the United States; and it was for the benefit of both. In using these lands to build that railroad we have added millions upon millions to the productive wealth of the country and to property in the State of Illinois, and the Federal Government and the whole country have received the benefit. I hold that that grant to the State of Illinois was one of the best acts this Government ever made. It was for the benefit of Illinois and of every section of the country and of the Government of the United States.

Since that time, we have made grants in Michigan, in Wisconsin, I think, in Iowa, Minnesota, and Kansas. We have something like fifteen railroads in the country to which we have made these land grants; but those grants were not so valuable to those companies as the grant to the State of Illinois. Many of those roads are not completed; they are in the market for the means to finish their roads; and this very proposition made here in Congress has a tendency to prevent persons loaning their money or investing their money to finish these roads. If it be understood that the Federal Government intends to exact out of those roads the money paid to them during the war for doing this sort of work, it will prevent the investment of money in them and the finishing of the roads.

Mr. COWAN. I ask the Senator which proposition would be most likely to affect the credit of these roads, the proposition to pay this money under protest, as is done by the Secretary, accompanied with the threat of an action to recover the money back, or the proviso as I propose to modify it, which simply saves the right of both parties, and leaves the question for future adjustment when the equities can be better known than now?

Mr. WILSON. I will tell the Senator precisely what I believe equity demands of us to do. I do not choose to stop here and quibble over the point—I do not apply that term to the Senator—whether this grant meant that we should use the road-bed, the right of way, by our own cars and our own employes to do this work, or whether it meant that we should require these corporations to do the work for the Government. I do not wish to dwell upon that point. There are differences of opinion on that subject. Some of the best lawyers in the country say that it means one thing, and some say it means the other. I take it that when we made this bargain it was expected by the whole country that these railroads would carry our munitions of war and our troops; and if the Army had remained as we then had it, or were likely then to have it, for our Indian wars and other matters, I think they would have performed the work and nothing would have been said about it and they never would have made any charge against the Government. But, sir, we made the grant; and what do we now have? This gigantic rebellion requiring these roads to do a work that will entirely ruin and destroy every one of them, unless it be the Illinois Central railroad, if we require them to do it without pay.

They had better throw up their lands to-day than undertake to do this work for nothing; and it is not for the interest of the country to check the finishing of these roads or to oppress them in any way. When this great rebellion broke out the Secretary of War made an arrangement with the railroad companies of the country to perform work for the Government at two thirds of the prices they charged the people of the country. That is to say, the rate was fixed in 1861, when the railroads were doing work cheaper than they are now, at two cents a mile for passengers. That was supposed to be a fair arrangement with the railroads of the country, and they agreed to do the Government work for just about two thirds of their ordinary charges. Then the Department made an arrangement with the land-grant railroads, making a deduction for the Government of thirty-three and a third per cent. from these rates. The land-grant railroads therefore do the work for thirty-three and a third per cent. less than the other railroads of the country, and they do it at two thirds of their ordinary charges. The Illinois Central railroad last year did the Government work for half a million dollars less than the other railroads of the country, which were not land-grant roads, performed the same kind of work.

Now, sir, I believe this arrangement to be based upon justice, and a fair and honest arrangement for the interest of the land-grant roads, for the interest of the new States, for the interest of the Government, for the interest of the country. I believe it is based upon equity and justice. Whatever provisions we may put into this bill, or any other bill, I have no idea that we are going to get any of this money back again. We had better not delude ourselves with any such idea. If the money is once paid to these companies they will no doubt keep it. As the arrangement which has been made is a just one, based upon a fair consideration of the case in view of the great burdens which we have put upon these roads which they did not expect, and we did not expect, when we made the grants, and as the land grants have been made for the benefit of the new States, for the benefit of all the people East and West, for the interests of the nation, and have added hundreds of millions of dollars to the wealth of the country; and as it is for our interest to have these roads finished, and to deal justly and fairly with them in view of the burdens put upon them by this war, I think we had better stand by the arrangement made by the War Department, which is a fair one, and let the railroad companies understand, let the Government understand, let the capitalists of the country who may be induced to invest in these new railroad enterprises and to finish them, understand, that we pay these land-grant railroad companies thirty-three and one third per cent. less than we pay the other railroads of the country for the service they do for the Government because of their land grants. I think we had better let the arrangement stand, and say nothing about reserving matters for future trial or for bringing cases into court. It is not for the interest of the country to go into court on these questions; it is not for the interest of the new States; it is not for the interest of the railroad companies; and I do not see that it is for the interest of anybody. I do not want to see any lawsuits grow out of it. I think the arrangement made by the War Department, which has gone on from August, 1861, to the present time—an arrangement made at a time when the railroads of the country did their work for less than they do now, because many of them have advanced their rates of fare and toll, for passengers and freight, forty and fifty per cent.—had better be continued. I think that arrangement is a fair and equitable adjustment between the Government and the railroad companies who have received grants of the public land.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into any elaborate discussion of this question, but I feel it perhaps due to state that the same subject which is involved in this amendment offered by the Finance Committee was before the Committee on Military Affairs, and was there very elaborately investigated and discussed; and that committee, after canvassing the matter very thoroughly, instructed its chairman to offer an amendment to this pending bill similar to the amendment which has already been offered by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. In other words, the Military Committee decided that it was best to leave the matter as it now stands, and under the arrangement and adjustment which has been made by the War Department.

I may state also in this connection, that while the Committee on Military Affairs did not concur fully in that view which was presented, that the language of the grants which required transportation free of toll by these companies involved the idea that the transportation should be made by the conveyances of the United States, and that they were simply to use the road or railway, but believed on the contrary that the language was intended and designed to cover the transportation by the company through their own modes of conveyance, and that was what the language was placed in the law for, yet they thought there was an interior equity in the case which should be considered by the Government as it is accustomed to consider matters of this sort. That equity was this: that when the grant was made it was never contemplated that such a use should be made of these roads as is now being made. In other words, it was never in contemplation that the whole running stock and rolling stock of the roads should be used in the transportation of Government freight and of Government troops, but it was designed simply to cover the case of the ordinary transportation of the Army stores of the Government. The committee were confirmed in that view by the fact that the law, where it recites this transient transportation, which was presumed to occur now and then, of troops and munitions of war, says it shall be free from toll, and where it relates to the mail service of the United States, which was evidently to be an onerous service and a continuous service, it is there provided that payment shall be made to the company.

These were the considerations that moved the Committee on Military Affairs to instruct its chairman to move this amendment. It has not been necessary, however, to do so, as the same amendment comes from the Finance Committee. I have simply felt it due to the Military Committee to make this statement in their behalf.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope that amendment will not be adopted, but that the proviso will be stricken out according to the report of the Committee on Finance. I think it is unnecessary to declare here that we intend in the future to collect this money from these railroad companies. I do not believe that the Government will do it, and it is unnecessary to make such a declaration unless we intend to carry it out.

I do not know how a proposition of this character will operate on all roads, but I can state to Senators that its operation will be very injurious on some of the roads in my State. I will instance the Pacific railroad, a company chartered to build a road from St. Louis to Kansas City. That company was chartered some years ago. Afterward a grant of land was made to the State of Missouri to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Louis to the southwest boundary of the State. The Legislature of Missouri granted the lands, that had been so given to the State for the purpose of aiding in the construction of that road, to the Pacific Railroad Company to build it. The line of road from St. Louis to Kansas City has been constructed for a distance, I think, of about one hundred and eighty-nine or one hundred and ninety miles. No lands whatever of that grant have been used in the construction of that main line; but since the grant was made to the company for the construction of the southwest branch railroad, I believe they have constructed of that southwest branch some thirty-seven or thirty-eight miles, from Franklin to Rolla, in the direction of Springfield.

Now, if this section be not stricken out, what will be the effect upon that company? The whole line of road from St. Louis in the direction of Kansas City will be required to carry freight for the Government without receiving a dollar. The road is not entirely completed to Kansas City.

We are attempting now to complete it, and the county of St. Louis a few days ago, I think, subscribed $700,000 more in order to complete the road to Kansas City. It is on the line of the main Pacific railroad to California. It is exceedingly important that that road should be constructed as early as possible; not only important for the commerce of the country, but important in a military point of view. The Legislature of Missouri is now husbanding resources for the completion of that road. Now, suppose the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania should be adopted, and a declaration should be made that it is likely that the Government hereafter will sue the railroad companies who have had land grants, to collect back the money which the Government has paid for its transportation, the result will be to prevent the construction of that road. It is important, I say, in a military point of view that it should be constructed. Last year when Price came into the State, the bridges from Franklin, where the southwest branch starts off in the direction of Springfield, clear up to Kansas City, were burnt. A great many bridges had been built even between Warrensburg and Kansas City, and they were burnt as the bridges of the railroads in Missouri have been burnt again and again. The result of this proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I say, will entirely defeat the construction of that road. You might as well declare at once that it shall not be built.

Let me ask Senators how much good the land grant has done that Pacific Railroad Company. There are eight hundred thousand acres of land lying between Rolla and Springfield, but the railroad company to-day cannot realize twenty-five cents an acre for the land. We can get nothing for the land, and every Senator knows it. The best improved lands in the State can be bought to-day for a mere song. We cannot construct the road with the land. It is utterly impossible to do so. Before we can get possession of the lands and realize on them by selling them, we must build the road. We can only sell the land in sections of twenty miles; as each twenty miles of road is built, we can sell the lands on each side of that section of twenty miles, but until the road is built we cannot sell the land. Here are one hundred and ninety miles of road built on the main line that never received an acre of land, but the same company is required to build the southwest branch railroad, and there are only thirty-seven miles of the southwest branch road built, and because lands have been granted along the line of the unfinished southwest branch you compel the Pacific Railroad Company to carry Government freight and troops and munitions over a line of one hundred and ninety miles, when the company never received a dollar, and never can receive a dollar of benefit from any land grant for that line. That will be the result. It is the same case with the Hannibal and St. Joseph road, except that the line of that road is already completed through; but the bridges and depots have been burnt again and again by the rebels. It has been, I know, with the greatest difficulty that the companies in Missouri have been able to keep up their roads. At times they have talked about surrendering them; giving them up entirely. What would have been the result of that? It would have cost the Government ten times as much to run those roads as it has ever paid for the transportation of its freight upon them. It never will be the case that the companies can pay back what they have received from the Government; and hence I say it is perfectly idle to talk about crippling the construction of these roads even by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

I thought we settled this question in 1862. It was then before us, and a resolution was passed, according to my recollection, leaving the matter to the Secretary of War, and he arranged with these companies to carry Government freight thirty-three and one third per cent. less than other companies whose roads had not been aided by land grants. I thought that was a full, complete, and perfect settlement of this whole question. That joint resolution was discussed here in February, 1862, and it was passed; and now the amendment proposes to go back behind that resolution and to declare that we may hereafter sue these companies to recover from them not only what we may hereafter pay under protest, but what has been paid under the resolution passed in February, 1862. As the chairman of the Military Committee has said, it was properly left to the Secretary of War. He investigated the matter, and, as I understand, called here representatives from the railroad interest in various parts of the country, and agreed with them as to the charges for transportation; and freight and passengers have been carried for the Government ever since under that arrangement; the land-grant roads receiving but two thirds of the regular Government rates.

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the question now. I did take it up and discuss it in 1862. I do not desire to repeat what was then said. It is not necessary to do so. Nor shall I discuss the proposition whether these companies are bound to use their own cars in the transportation of Government property or not. My belief is that the intention of the laws making the grants was that they should furnish their cars and carry freight for the Government; but at the time of the passage of those laws, was it contemplated that we should ever have a war of this character? Was it contemplated that we should have at one time in this country an army of a million of men? Was it contemplated that the entire and almost exclusive business of long lines of railroad in this country should be the transportation of property and persons for the Government of the United States for a period of three or four years? I undertake to say that nothing of that sort was in the most distant dream of any member voting for those bills. Nothing of that sort entered then into the imagination of man.

What will be the result of the legislation now proposed? It will be that all the land-grant railroads in the country will be turned over to the Government, and Mr. Secretary Stanton will be compelled to furnish men and locomotives and cars to run the railroads in order to carry persons and property that must necessarily be carried for the Government. If such a result as that shall be produced Congress will find that it will cost forty times as much to do the work as we have paid. I think the matter has been properly left to the Secretary of War. Let him continue to deduct thirty-three and a third per cent. from the land-grant companies, and let us stand by the settlement which was made under the joint resolution passed in 1862.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have three papers here relating to this matter which I have not read, but I would like to have them printed that the House of Representatives may have them before them and that we may have the benefit of them in the committee of conference which will be had on this bill. The first is a letter of General Meigs, and documents connected with it. The second is the report of Mr. Porter in the House of Representatives favoring the right of the United States to use the roads for transportation purposes; and the third is the argument of the counsel for the railroad company, all of them containing important references, and I think they had better be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRIMES. Strange as it may seem for a person living in a State interested in railroads, as I do, and that enjoys this benefaction of the Government, I am nevertheless in favor of the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I think it ought to receive the sanction of this body. I suppose it possible that some of the roads in the State of Missouri are now being prosecuted under very adverse circumstances; it is possible that they have great difficulties to overcome in completing their Pacific railroad; but I think the Senate, and even the Senator from Missouri, will agree with me that it would be hardly safe for us to be governed in our legislation here by any circumstances that may happen in the very anomalous condition of that State at this time.

If I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, it is to leave this whole question in abeyance; leave it open to be settled hereafter as Congress may in the future determine; and that is the way I think it ought to be left. At present, as I understand the Senator from Missouri, the Secretary of War pays to each of the land-grant railroad companies two thirds of the amount that is paid for the transportation of troops and munitions of war on other railroads. Now let me give an example to show that we ought not to adopt any legislation here to convince the Secretary of War that we approve the action he has hitherto taken. That great mammoth corporation, the Illinois Central Railroad Company, has received, according to the lowest estimate that I have heard placed upon the profits derived by that company from the benefactions of the Government, $30,000,000. Here is another railroad in the State of Wisconsin that has only received one hundred and fifty thousand acres of land, the value of which does not exceed $500,000, and it is compelled by the terms of its grant to complete three hundred and fifty miles of road just as the Illinois Central was compelled to complete a certain number of miles of road, say five hundred. According to the rule established by the Secretary of War the company in Wisconsin that only received a grant of land to the value of $500,000 gets no more for transporting troops and munitions of war for the Government than the Illinois Central Railroad Company, that has received sixty times as much from your Treasury. Is that fair? It seems to me that it is not. I want, therefore, to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, so that this whole question may stand over and be subject to further adjudication or determination by Congress or such officers as Congress may hereafter designate to determine it.

It is absurd upon the very face of it to say that a company that receives only the sixtieth part of the funds for the purpose of building its road shall be compelled to transport troops and munitions of war upon the same terms with a company who received sixty times more aid for the same distance of travel. I think that I voted on a former occasion to pay the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company in Missouri the full amount, not only the sixty-six and two thirds per cent. but the additional thirty-three and one third, and I would do it again. I think that if the proposition was before me, I would vote to pay the Pacific Railroad Company, of which the Senator from Missouri has spoken, and which has met with so many disasters in the destruction of its water-tanks and its stations and its engines, the full amount paid to any other company for the same service, not because the company is entitled to it by the strict letter of the law, but because I would be willing in that way to make up as far as I could for the disasters that have befallen it. At the same time it does not seem to me that because of the disasters that have happened to the roads in Missouri, mammoth corporations in other portions of the country should be entirely exempt from performing a reasonable portion of that duty to the Government which they undertook to perform and contracted to perform at the time they received their grants of land.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before voting on this proposition I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator who has charge of this bill. He has just sent to the table to have printed the different views that are taken in regard to the construction of these land grants. It is most probable that this bill will not be finished to-night, and I suggest that it would be better to let those views be published, so that we may see them before disposing of this question, and let us pass to the other amendments, passing over this amendment for the time being. Then, unless we should get through with the bill to-night, we can have before us on Monday the arguments which have been presented to the committee on both sides of this question.

I by no means regard it as a clear proposition of law that these railroad companies are compelled to furnish hands and brakemen and locomotives to transport the property of the Government of the United States under the acts making land grants. It is an entire mistake also to suppose that the United States has parted with such very great interests by making these land grants. I am no apologist or defender of monopolies anywhere, nor am I the advocate in any shape or form of the Central Railroad Company of Illinois; but Senators should not forget that the Government of the United States never sacrificed a dollar from its Treasury to the Central railroad of Illinois. You charged double price for every acre of land reserved along the line of the road. You gave one section and held the other at $2 50 an acre, and you have sold every one of them. They had remained there unsold in market for thirty years, and you have received the money from them, and the same amount that you would without the grant; the people of Illinois have paid for it and paid all that you held your lands at, and they paid earlier than they otherwise would. As the Senator from Massachusetts said, it has been mutually beneficial to the people of this country. To create an impression here that a great bonus has been given, and that therefore some great obligation attaches, is wrong. The company is entitled to its rights, the Government of the United States to its. There is a controversy as to the construction of the grants. I am not going into that argument at this time; I prefer looking into the arguments that have been presented before I do so; but it has been stated here, and I believe it to be true, that the same language employed in the grant to these railroad companies was before employed in grants to turnpike companies and to canal companies; and does anybody suppose that when lands were granted to a canal company for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a canal, upon condition that that canal should be a public highway and forever free for the transportation of the property of the Government of the United States, it was meant that the persons who owned canal-boats should transport that property for nothing? Was that the meaning of the grant, or did it mean just as it does with a turnpike company, that the stages of the Government of the United States or the wagons of the Government of the United States might pass through the toll-gates without paying toll? But it is said that this language is not applicable to a railroad. It is no new language. It had been incorporated into the grants made to turnpike companies and to canal companies; it had been well understood; and I take it to be a settled rule of law that when language has received a construction and it is afterward incorporated into a subsequent statute, the construction it has received in the former statute is the one it must have in the subsequent one.

I do not propose, however, to express even an opinion upon that point at this time; or to go into any discussion in regard to it. My suggestion is that as this matter has been investigated in the documents presented by the Senator from Ohio, certainly more elaborately than I have looked into it, for I have paid no particular attention to it, have made no examination of the statutes even in reference to these land-grants, except in one or two cases that I have casually looked at, we pass by this amendment at present and go on to other amendments. It will not retard the bill; and if we do get through, then let us come back to this amendment, and if it is desirable to pass the bill to-night we can still act upon it. It will not delay anything by passing to the next amendment, and we can, perhaps, examine these papers, even if we should not get them printed, before we are compelled to vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to passing it over informally; but Senators know the pressure of business, and if the bill goes over to Monday—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not ask that it go over. We shall see how that may be when we get through the other amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, let it be passed over at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will be passed over informally.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have one more amendment to offer, to come in as the second section of the bill:

And be it further enacted, That to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the current fiscal year for ordnance, ordnance stores, and supplies, including the purchase and manufacture of arms, accouterments, and horse equipments for volunteers and regulars, the sum of $7,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The deficiency for the ordnance service was not submitted with the other deficiency estimates, for reasons that are given by General Dyer; and it is found necessary for the ordinary supplies of the Ordnance Bureau to have $7,000,000 more. We have no means to limit the amount, and therefore recommend an appropriation of the amount asked for. I have no further explanation to make than simply the statement of General Dyer that this is necessary for arms, accouterments, &c., for the forces that are being called into the service.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the appropriation in the bill from the House?

Mr. SHERMAN. The appropriation in the bill is for the next fiscal year; this is for a deficiency for the present year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I send to the Chair an amendment proposing three additional sections to the bill.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of March, 1865, and during the continuance of the present rebellion, the commutation price of officers' subsistence shall be fifty cents per ration: Provided, That said increase shall not apply to the commutation price of the rations of any officer above the rank of brevet brigadier general, or of any officer entitled to commutation for fuel or quarters.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That hereafter, during the continuance of the present rebellion, there shall be no deductions made from, or income tax levied upon, the salary of any officer in the military or naval service; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That all officers of volunteers, who shall continue in the military service to the close of the war, shall be entitled to receive, upon being mustered out of said service, three months' pay proper: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to officers not on duty, or to officers entitled to commutation of fuel and quarters.

Mr. WILSON. I hope it is not necessary to detain the Senate by explaining at any length the provisions of this amendment. The first section proposes to commute at fifty cents the officers' ration, which is now commuted at thirty cents. This will add especially the line officers, and I am sure we should do something at the present time for the officers of the Army. It does not apply to general officers, or to officers who receive commutation of fuel and quarters; it applies only to officers who are in the field in the performance of their duty.

The next section takes off the tax we have imposed on the pay of Army and Navy officers since the war commenced; it applies to all the officers. I think justice requires that we should take off that tax.

The third section of the amendment simply provides that volunteer officers who will remain in the service until the close of the war shall receive three months' pay proper on being mustered out of service. It is a sort of bounty to them to remain in the service until the close of the war.

Mr. COLLAMER. Permit me to ask one question in regard to that provision. Suppose an officer is ordered away on a court-martial just as the war ends, is that to prevent his getting the three months' pay?

Mr. WILSON. I think the section applies to all volunteer officers who may be in the service of the country at the end of the war.

Mr. COLLAMER. The proviso says that the section shall not apply to "officers not on duty."

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to strike out the proviso to that section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he had better offer each of these sections as a separate amendment, and let us vote on each by itself.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to strike out the proviso to the third section; and then to take the vote on the first and second sections as one proposition, and on the third section by itself, as some Senators may be willing to vote for the first and second sections who are not willing to vote for the third section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say something against the second section, and I hope each section will be regarded as a separate amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Then I offer simply the first section by itself:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of March, 1865, and during the continuance of the present rebellion, the commutation price of officers' subsistence shall be fifty cents per ration: Provided, That said increase shall not apply to the commutation price of the rations of any officer above the rank of brevet brigadier general, or of any officer entitled to commutation for fuel or quarters.

Mr. SHERMAN. Although generally disinclined to the increase of the pay of anybody during the war and till we are better able to pay and have better means to pay, I am satisfied from numerous communications which I have received from officers of the Army that to continue their present pay without relief would be an act of gross injustice. I am therefore willing to vote for some increase of their pay. I will read an extract from a letter of a very intelligent officer, who gives the details of his own experience and the condition to which he is reduced by his present pay:

"It were needless, perhaps, for me to enter into the facts of the case, as of course you must be conversant with the subject. But let me briefly call your attention to the fact, as shown below, that many non-commissioned officers, hospital stewards, commissary, quartermaster, and first sergeants, with no responsibility, virtually receive as much or more pay, (including rations, clothing, &c.,) as a second lieutenant of the line. For instance:

Pay of second lieutenant, including "allowances," per month.....$103 50
Cost of subsistence per month.....$30 00

That is surely a very low rate.

Servant's hire (average) per month..... 25 00
Cost of clothing (average, low estimate)..... 10 00

I do not see how an officer can get his clothing for ten dollars a month.

Tax (about) per month..... 5 00

$70 00

Balance.....$33 50

That is all that is left with which to support his family or those dependent on him.

Pay of first sergeant (veteran) per month.....$24 00
Bounty (average for three years) per month..... 11 00

Total.....$35 00

Besides, there are the local bounties, so that I have no doubt the corporals and sergeants are paid better than the first and second lieutenants, and many of those officers, I have no doubt, are really reduced to suffering. For one, I am willing to stretch a point in favor of these officers, and give them at least a decent subsistence. It is by their sacrifices, their courage, and their devotion that we shall be enabled to succeed in this war.

Another officer, known to me personally, who I know is a careful man and a man of no bad habits, says:

"To show how the case stands with a line officer, I will compare the expenses of a first lieutenant with his pay:

Pay proper of first lieutenant per month.....$50 00
Allowance of ration money per month..... 36 00
Allowance for servant per month..... 13 50
Allowance for servant's rations per month..... 9 00

Total.....$108 50

Cost of subsistence per month.....$30 00

That is put at the lowest rate for the commonest fare; it is written from Hardeeville, South Carolina. It is scarcely enough to pay for the pork consumed by one man.

Cost of subsistence per month.....$30 00
Cost of servant "..... 25 00
Cost of servant's ration "..... 9 00
Tax "..... 5 00
Average cost of clothing "..... 16 00

Total.....$85 00

Remaining after paying expenses.....$23 50

It is manifest from this statement, which is known to be true by almost every intelligent man, that owing to the high prices of provisions and clothing these officers cannot subsist on their present pay. I have also another letter which struck me as very forcible, but which I will not read, to the same effect. I have conversed within a few days with line officers in the twenty-third Army corps who have been within reach, and they uniformly say that they cannot subsist at their present rate of pay. Whether the increased allowance now proposed by the Military Committee is enough, I do not know. The twenty cents addition to the commutation of the ration will make about twenty dollars a month addition, I understand.

Mr. WILSON. It adds about $290 a year to the pay of a second lieutenant.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I am about right; it is over twenty dollars a month.

Mr. WILSON. This section and the one in regard to the tax make an addition of about $320 a year.

Mr. CONNESS. I simply rise to concur in what the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance has said, and to add that I hold in my hand one of many letters addressed to myself on this subject, similar to those read by the honorable Senator. This is signed by seven officers, including all ranks from major to second lieutenant, in the second Massachusetts cavalry, that portion of them particularly who came from California and entered the service in that regiment, and who have done good service. They state that their salary is absolutely insufficient to defray their necessary expenses. I hope this slight increase will be voted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now offer the second section as a separate amendment:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That hereafter, during the continuance of the present rebellion, there shall be no deductions made from, or income tax levied upon, the salary of any officer in the military or naval service; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust this amendment will not be adopted; or if it be adopted it certainly should not be in this place; it is not pertinent to the appropriation bill, being a proposition to make an exemption from the income tax. We shall have before us next week a bill in relation to the income tax, and this amendment will be pertinent to that. I think I can give very good reasons why no exception or exemption should be made in regard to the collection of the income tax; but whether that is so or not, it is evident that the tax bill will be before us during the next week, and we can then act on this proposition.

Several SENATORS, (to Mr. WILSON.) Withdraw your amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to withdraw it; but I assure the Senate that I shall make the effort to relieve the officers from the income tax, for I believe it ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON. I now offer the remaining section without the proviso:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That all officers of volunteers who shall continue in the military service to the close of the war shall be entitled to receive, upon being mustered out of said service, three months' pay proper.

Mr. HOWE. Does that apply to all officers, of every rank?

Mr. WILSON. It applies to all volunteer officers who will remain in the service until the close of the war, and provides that on their being mustered out of the service of the United States they shall receive three months' pay proper, without any emoluments or allowances. This would give to a lieutenant $135, and to a captain $150 or $160. It is not a large sum, but it is a small inducement to men to stay in the service. There is everywhere a strong disposition on the part of the officers now to get out of the service; and I think that if you were to say to the officers of the Army that it would be an honorable thing for them in the face of the enemy to resign their commissions and go home, you would find the great mass of them resigning. The reason is that they do not get sufficient pay to support their families as they ought to be supported. They have to make great sacrifices; they hear from home that all persons engaged in business are making money, and many of them want to get out of the service and go home and take care of their families, after having served, some two, some three, and some nearly four years. Now, in order to show these men that we want them to stay in the service in spite of the present condition of the finances of the country, we propose to say to them, "Remain in the service to the end of the war, and when you are mustered out we will pay you three months' pay," as a sort of bonus. Everybody knows that after they are mustered out it will be some weeks before they can get into any other business or employment. I think we ought to do it. It is a very small matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have but very little to say in reference to this subject. I have no doubt there ought to be an increase in the pay of the subordinate officers of the Army, and I think the increase should begin with the lieutenant and go up to the colonel. I would not increase the pay of officers above the grade of colonel. I would make but a slight increase of the pay of the colonel, the lieutenant colonel, and the major, while I would increase considerably that of the captain and the lieutenant, for the latter have nearly the same expenses to incur as the superior officers. I think the pay of field officers of a regiment ought to approximate very nearly to that of a brigadier general. Everything in an army depends upon the organization and management of the regiment, and the regiment depends upon the proper organization and management of the company. The moment you enter the lines of an army you can tell the difference between a good colonel and a poor one placed in the command of a regiment. I think the pay ought to be increased in order to keep in the field your good officers in command of your regiments and of your companies. As to the expense that will be incurred, I have only to say that an efficient army properly officered will do more good than a greatly increased army with inferior or indifferent officers. It is true you require at the head of the Army an able man. His pay I deem to be sufficient; and the increase of pay necessary to keep good officers in the Army should be confined to those who receive a small amount of pay and have no great rank.

Mr. HOWE. I for one do not see any necessity for giving this bonus to secure the continuance in service of general officers. My own impression is that they are paid very liberally now, paid better, I think, than the public servants generally are. I cannot vote for the proposition in its present state. I do not care to move an amendment, but I think I should vote for this proposition if general officers were excepted. I cannot vote for it as it is.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to confine the provision to officers below the rank of brigadier general; and I modify the amendment to read:

That all officers of volunteers, below the rank of brigadier general, who shall continue in the military service to the close of the war, shall be entitled to receive, upon being mustered out of said service, three months' pay proper.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suggest that this amendment seems to contemplate it as a matter of the officers' own choice whether they remain or not. There are many officers willing to remain who are mustered out because the term of their regiment has expired.

Mr. WILSON. We cannot help that.

Mr. GRIMES. This amendment would apply to the cloud of quartermasters, and commissaries, and paymasters who may happen to be in service at the close of the war, and to all the adjutant generals and all the ten or twenty grades of staff officers that we have. It is intended, I suppose, by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to keep in service the line officers of the regiments; but I do not think we ought at this time to adopt any such legislation as this. I am afraid we are not sufficiently near the close of the rebellion to adopt any such legislation. It is not necessary, in my apprehension; and I hope that at this time we shall not pledge ourselves to any such thing as this.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "now in commission" after "volunteers," so as to have it apply only to officers now in commission, and not to apply to those who may be commissioned hereafter.

Mr. JOHNSON. Would not that defeat the object?

Mr. HOWE. I did not understand that it was the purpose of the amendment to hold out inducements to officers to take commissions, but to hold out an inducement to officers who have held commissions, who are experienced and skilled and worth more than new officers to the service, to continue in the service. With that purpose I sympathize. I have not found any necessity of bribing other gentlemen to come into the service. I have found them very public spirited, and patriotic, and willing to serve; and I think that disposition will continue to the end of the war; but I do not think we ought to adopt a proposition which will oblige the Government to pay three months' additional pay to all officers in commission at the close of the war, including those who may be commissioned three weeks before the close of the war.

Mr. WILSON. I think that would be a very small matter after all. There will be very few men commissioned just as the war is about to close. Senators tell us that this provision will apply to staff officers. I do not know of any body of men in the country to whom it could more justly apply than staff officers. There are no more important men connected with an army than staff officers, and there are none that the laws of this country have done so little for. We have to-day an unorganized staff for our armies, contrary to the whole theory of army organization, because we have refused, session after session, to pass any legislation on that subject. We have now before us a bill recommended by the Secretary of War and by the Lieutenant General of the Army to do something for the proper organization of staffs and to adjust them according to their commands, but I think it is very doubtful whether we shall pass it.

This provision will apply to surgeons; and if there is a class of men in the country who need legislation in their behalf it is the surgeons in our armies. Many of them came into the service at the commencement of this war as majors; they entered the service from patriotic motives, and some of them have been in the service more than three years, and they now have the same rank, pay, and emoluments as when they came in, and they do not get enough to support themselves and their families decently. No opportunity whatever for advancement has been given to them. A surgeon with the rank of major is often at the head of the medical corps of an army, or an Army corps, or a division, with the same rank and the same pay as a regimental surgeon with one hundred on two hundred men to look after.

It is said that the amendment will apply to paymasters, and quartermasters, and commissaries. Well, sir, quartermasters and commissaries are resigning all the time; the best officers you have are going out of the service, and you are appointing every day a cloud, as the Senator calls it, of quartermasters and commissaries; and why? Because a cloud of the best of them is going out all the time. They will not stay in the service, and why not? An honest man cannot get a living in it. Take a quartermaster, a man of real ability as he should be to be a quartermaster; you put him into the service, with a captain's pay, and he has to take charge of millions of your property. Through the hands of some of these men $10,000,000 have passed annually, and if they are honest men and have done their duty to the Government it is a great loss to lose them; and it is your honest and best men that are going out of the service.

I suppose some of those men have not been honest, but I believe the great mass of them have been. I do not know a quartermaster or a commissary in this country that has made $1,000 since this war opened. There may be such, and probably are, but I do not know one in my acquaintance. I think there is no reason why the section should not apply to those officers. The commissaries are now asking us to pass a bill to put their department on the same footing with the quartermaster's department; but it is with the greatest difficulty we can ever do anything here for the surgeons, the commissaries, the quartermasters, or any other class of staff officers.

Then as to paymasters; under the present laws of the country a paymaster can make nothing of any account. He is a major; he has to give large bonds; he handles hundreds of thousands of dollars; if he is a dishonest man he may cheat somebody; if he is an honest man he has very hard work to support himself and his family.

Now, sir, taking into view the little we have done for the staff officers, I think we ought not to exclude them from the benefit of this provision. In regard to the line of the Army, I know that, especially among the captains and lieutenants, there is a strong disposition to get out of the service; and hundreds of them are tendering their resignations, and they are not accepted because the Government does not wish to lose their services; and it is generally your best men, men who can do something else, men who can better their condition at home, that want to get out of the service, and they are only kept there by patriotic motives.

I hope this amendment will be adopted, excluding as it now does general officers, who I think are well paid. Many of them have written to me complaining that the commutation price of their rations is not raised; they think it is hard to exclude them from this provision; but I think brigadier and major generals are very well paid under our laws, and I am perfectly willing that they shall be exempted from the benefits of this section. I think this little bonus that we propose to offer to our officers who remain faithful to the flag until the war is over is a small matter any.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D Session.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 57.

way, but it will show them that the Government of the country in this exigency of our finances cares something for them.

Mr. RIDDLE. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. It is generally known that I am disposed to be liberal in my votes in regard to the compensation of all officers of the Government; but I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what is the compensation of a paymaster in Washington, including the privileges and emoluments which he enjoys.

Mr. WILSON. I have not calculated the figures, but it is a major's pay, with commutation for fuel and quarters in the city of Washington, which is higher than anywhere else in the country. Many of the paymasters, portions of the time, have no fuel and quarters.

Mr. RIDDLE. I am told it is $3,600 a year.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I concur fully in the views expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts in reference to these officers not in the line. Many of your paymasters handle millions per annum. They are very poorly paid; they are going out of the service, as he says, every day; you are losing the best of them, and the reason is that they are not paid enough. The best mode of compensating them, in my opinion, would be to pay them a small percentage upon their disbursements, so that the officer who transacted a large amount of business would receive more compensation than one who did no business; and so it ought to be in reference to the quartermasters and the commissaries. If you retain competent and proper officers to manage these most important departments of the Army you will have to increase the pay of the paymasters, the quartermasters, and the commissaries more than the officers of the line. At one time in our history, I believe, we paid a percentage to our paymasters. That plan has been long discontinued, but I believe it is the best mode of payment; you might make the amount small, but an officer who handles a large amount of money should receive compensation in proportion to that amount. With your present compensation to your paymasters, and quartermasters, and commissaries, you get rid of the best as fast as they can resign and get out of the service, and retain only the most indifferent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson.] The Senator from Wisconsin moves to amend the amendment by inserting the words "now in commission" after the word "volunteers."

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to—aye twenty-four, noes not counted.

Mr. WILSON. I now offer the following, as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That commissioned officers of the Army, serving in the field, shall hereafter be permitted to purchase rations for their own use, on credit, from any commissary of subsistence, at cost prices, and the amount due for rations so purchased shall be reported monthly to the Paymaster General, to be deducted from the payment next following such purchase. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such orders and regulations as he may deem best calculated to insure the proper observance hereof.

I will say, in explanation of the amendment, that if this provision had been in existence during the war it would have saved millions of dollars to the Government of the United States. It will cost nothing whatever; we shall not lose a dollar by it; but I think we shall gain a great deal by it annually. Besides that, it will be a great relief to our Army officers, some of whom have not now been paid for six months. They purchase now by paying the cash to the commissaries, and the commissaries pay the money into the Treasury of the United States. If they are honest men they pay the whole of it; if they are not honest they pay as much of it as they choose to pay into the Treasury. It is said—I do not know whether it is true or not—that there are some commissaries who have made a great deal of money during this war in this way. I know none such.

Mr. GRIMES. Permit me to inquire if these are the same commissaries whom the Senator has just proposed to give three months' extra pay; to in order to keep them in the service.

Mr. WILSON. I do not say that this is true, but such representations are made. I know of no such officer myself, but it is evident that it is possible the thing may be done. This amendment provides for exactly what is done in the case of a sick officer. An officer wounded or sick comes up from the front and goes to Annapolis, or any of your hospitals; he has no money; the Government furnishes him his support and charges him one dollar a day, and it is charged on his account and deducted from his pay. The Government has not lost a dollar from the beginning of the war in that way, and cannot lose a dollar by this provision.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Allow me to ask a question. If I understand the amendment correctly, the only change is that it allows the officer to buy upon credit instead of requiring him to pay cash down.

Mr. WILSON. That is all. The thing is precisely this: the officer purchases with money now if he has it or can borrow it from his associates or get it from home, when the Government has not paid him for a long while; and many of the officers now have not a dollar and have not had for some time. They purchase from the commissary and pay the money to the commissary, and the commissary pays it over to the Government. If you adopt this provision, the officer will purchase what he desires of the commissary, who will charge it on his account and turn the account over to the paymaster, and the paymaster will take it out of his pay. There is not a chance of losing a dollar by it. On the contrary, if there is an opportunity on the part of the commissaries to keep any of this money now, it cuts that up root and branch. I am told by men who understand this matter and know all about it that in their opinion it will save a great deal of money to the Treasury of the United States, and there is not an opportunity to lose anything whatever. If a man dies, the money is not lost. There is no chance of losing it any more than there is in your hospitals where you are doing the same thing every day in regard to hundreds of officers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that the amount which an officer may buy in this way ought to be limited. The amendment, as I understand it, now is without limitation in that respect; but perhaps it is contemplated that it may be limited by regulation.

Mr. WILSON. The amendment provides that the Secretary of War may make such regulations as he deems proper to carry the provision into effect.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is right.

Mr. WILSON. At the present rates of things at the front, an officer is not likely to buy more than he can help. I have before me a list of the prices now charged to officers in the army of the Potomac—ham 25 cents a pound; coffee 55 cents; tea $1 35; sugar 25 cents; potatoes $1 50 a bushel; pork 18 cents a pound; beef 20 cents; and so on.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am in favor of the proposition. It is a useful one, I think.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to be allowed at this time to offer a resolution. I send it to the Chair to be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Whereas in a speech recently delivered by Hon. Albert G. Brown, late a member of this body and now a member of the confederate congress, as reported in the New York Herald of the 14th instant, the following statement is made:

"Stanton, the last of this ignoble trio of blatant Democrats, alone remains."

Mr. SHERMAN. It is manifest that enough of that has been read to show that it cannot be received.

Mr. WILSON. I object to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be received at this time, the Army appropriation bill being under consideration.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I give notice that I shall offer my resolution at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. WILSON. I move further to amend the bill by adding the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States may appoint, in addition to the number of cadets heretofore authorized by law, from among the orphan children of officers or soldiers who have been or may be killed in battle, or who have died or may die of disease incurred in the line of duty during the present rebellion, two cadets for each State represented in Congress, who shall be actual residents of the State for which they may be appointed; and fifty cadets, to be appointed from the military forces of the United States, regular and volunteer, who shall have served for a period of not less than nine months.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that this amendment is open to serious objection, because of the unequal distribution of these appointments. It gives to each State two cadets. The State of Delaware, with a comparatively small population, would have as many as the State of New York. It is unjust, I think, to the larger States, and I cannot vote for it. Senators are not allowed to designate cadets because of the inequality between the large and small States that would be the result of their doing so. I should like myself to nominate a cadet now; but members of the Senate have no power to do it, and the reason which has been always given is that to allow Senators to nominate cadets would be to make the matter unequal, and the benefits of the West Point Academy ought to be distributed according to population. This amendment introduces a new system in regard to the appointment of cadets at West Point which I think very improper, and of which States like New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Massachusetts would have a just right to complain.

Mr. WILSON. It is estimated that we can increase the number of cadets to four hundred with the present conveniences we have at West Point; that if we do so we shall not have to increase our accommodations there in any respect. The increase now proposed, if the whole country was represented in Congress, would give about three hundred and seventy-five cadets. We have proposed several times that the Senators shall appoint cadets, and I do not think that proposition was ever voted down because of the inequality of it, but rather on the ground of the inconvenience to Senators. Every effort has been made to improve the present system of appointment. A year or two ago we proposed, I think, to allow some to be made by Senators and Governors of the States, and to authorize the President to make more appointments. We proposed several modes, none of which were accepted. Now, it is proposed that fifty cadets, two from each State, shall be appointed by the President from the orphan children of the officers and soldiers who have fallen in the war, and that fifty shall be appointed by the President from the ranks of the Army. I think the arrangement is a good one. If Senators say it is not equal to give two to each State, I am willing to strike that provision out, and let the appointments be made wherever the President chooses to make them in the country.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope this amendment will not be adopted, for the reasons urged against it by the honorable Senator from Ohio. The operation of it will be so unequal and so unjust as to make the School even more odious than it is at present. I think the time is not far distant when Congress will find it necessary to take the subject of the West Point Academy in hand, and make some radical improvements in the whole system. I hope to see that day, and I expect to see it; but I cannot vote for this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; it is entirely unequal, and therefore very objectionable.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all chaplains in the military service of the United States shall, when practicable, hold appropriate religious services at burial of soldiers who may die in the commands to which they are attached; that they shall devote their entire time to their appropriate work as chaplains, and that it shall be their duty to hold public religious services at least once each Sabbath, when circumstances will permit.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like very much the idea of regulating the duties of chaplains on an appropriation bill. If they do not now perform the duties prescribed in this amendment they ought to be turned out.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe what this amendment proposes is the law now, and I do not hear any complaint that chaplains do not do what they can do consistent with the military requisitions of the service. I believe it is precisely the law now.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have been informed by those conversant with the affairs of chaplains that they do not devote themselves to the burial of soldiers; and if they do not, it is high time that their attention should be called to that subject. It is a well-known fact, also, that chaplains in the service perform other duties, duties connected with religious denominations as ministers, receiving pay from the Government of the United States as chaplains and pay from their respective denominations as ministers. This is the case with a number in this city as I am informed, and it is also the case with numbers of others throughout the country. This is a good time, in my opinion, to make this amendment, and it should be put upon an appropriation bill because it will be sure to pass there sooner than anywhere else. I trust it may receive the sanction of the Senate.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I offer this as a new section:
SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause tobacco to be furnished to the enlisted men of the Army at cost prices, exclusive of the cost of transportation, in such quantities as they may require, not exceeding sixteen ounces per month, and the amount due therefor shall be deducted from their pay in the same manner as at present provided for the settlement of clothing accounts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I submit the following amendment:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Paymaster General of the United States Army shall hereafter have the rank, pay, and emoluments of brigadier general.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That there shall be added to the pay department of the United States Army, as now organized, two assistant paymaster generals, who shall be ex officio inspector generals of the department, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels of infantry. And in addition to the two deputy paymaster generals now authorized, there shall be added ten others, subject to the same conditions and provisions as by existing laws provided for deputy paymaster generals.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the appointments to the offices herein created shall be made by selection from the officers of the pay department of the United States Army, including the additional paymasters and the chief clerk, and who shall have had at least two years' service and experience in the duties of the pay department; after such appointments have been once filled, all vacancies occurring shall be supplied as now by law prescribed for the other staff departments of the Army.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the assistant and deputy paymaster generals shall give bond in the manner now required of deputy paymaster generals, and shall be subject to any duty in the pay department to which they may be assigned by the Secretary of War.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That whenever a pay district shall be established, for the charge, superintendence, and command of which no assistant or deputy paymaster general shall be available as chief, the Secretary of War may detail any paymaster or additional paymaster of the Army to do the duties of such chief; and during the continuance of such detail and duties, and no longer, the officer so detailed shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a deputy paymaster general: Provided, That the total number of such acting deputies shall not, at any one time, exceed ten.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall have authority to detail officers of the pay department for duty as inspectors of such department, not exceeding four at any one time, who, during the continuance of such detail and duties, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of deputy paymaster generals. And they, together with the inspector generals herein provided for, shall have the powers and authority within their own department now by law and regulations conferred upon inspector generals of the Army.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. This whole subject has been before the Military Committee, and has been extensively considered, and they have reported a bill reorganizing the pay department. I am opposed at this stage to putting that bill on the Army appropriation bill as an amendment, making a large increase in the staff of the regular Army, and no provision for volunteer officers. The whole subject is now before us in connection with the bill reported by the committee, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I agree in some respects with the views expressed by the honorable Senator from Indiana; but it must be observed by the Senate that the pay department of the Army has remained in its present organization since the commencement of the war. That organization was for an army of fifteen or twenty thousand men, and your Army has been increased to a million men. The increased amount of pay which this amendment will draw from the Treasury is but about five thousand dollars. It does not add an additional officer to the regular service or any other service. The officers provided for are to be taken from the service—from the volunteers and from the regulars. It simply grades the officers; I do not understand that it increases their number. Since the war commenced you have reorganized the Surgeon General's department; you have reorganized the Quartermaster's department; you have gone on organizing the regular Army, and yet not the slightest attention has been paid to this most important branch of the public service.

It seems to me that this bill is a good place to which to attach this provision. I move it as an amendment to this appropriation bill, not because it is entirely appropriate to that bill, but because there is so little time before the adjournment of Congress that it is important to seize this opportunity to bring the subject, if possible, before the other House at an early day. The measure comes from the War Department; it has received the sanction of the Secretary of War; it has received the sanction of the highest officers in the pay department; and it has received the sanction of others interested in the public service. They all say that the public service demands that this organization should be made, in order that the pay department may work more efficiently and better than it has heretofore worked.

There is one important idea which should not be lost sight of in this connection. The officer in charge of this department having perhaps a hundred men under him attending to all the disbursements for the pay of the Army, has no more pay, no more rank, no higher command than any one of the hundred paymasters of whom he has charge. I am sure that if the facts in regard to the present organization were known to Senators as they are known to the Army the effect would be at once to induce a change and a reorganization.

I really hope the chairman of the Committee on Finance will not object to this amendment, but will consent that it shall be attached to this bill and go to the House of Representatives. If it shall be objectionable to that body, it may be stricken out by the committee of conference. But, sir, in behalf of this service, one of the most important services of the Government, I appeal to him to let it go on the bill, as he has already consented to other amendments from the Military Committee; let it go before the House of Representatives for its action, and then, if it is objectionable, let the committee of conference finally strike it out.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there are no other amendments to be proposed, I ask that we now go back to the amendment which was passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment which was passed over will now be taken up. The Committee on Finance proposed to strike out the proviso at the end of the bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] proposed to amend the proviso so as to make it read:

Provided, That money appropriated by this act, or any other act, and used for the purpose of paying any railroad company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States, when such company may have accepted a grant of lands from Congress upon condition of furnishing said transportation free of toll or other charge, shall be subject to future adjustment between the United States and said companies, it not being intended to admit the right of said companies to compensation for such transportation.

The first question is on this amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the proviso.

Mr. BROWN. I do not see in his seat the Senator who offered this amendment, but I would call attention to the fact that he strikes out the words "except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress." Those words are to be stricken out, and yet those cases are already covered by act of Congress, and are legalized, and the result of this proviso would be to unsettle that class of cases, cases that are covered now, and that occurred in my own State!

Mr. JOHNSON. I submit to the Senate that the authority is only to adjust them. Of course they are to be adjusted under the law. No law is repealed by this provision. If by the laws to which reference is made, and which are not mentioned in the proviso, the Government has surrendered its right to use the roads, of course there can be no claim on the part of the Government.

Mr. BROWN. I would suggest to the Senator, in reply, that here are cases in which Congress by special act has authorized the Secretary of War to go on and make payments to certain railroad companies. Now, this proviso here covers all payments that are made to all the roads that have had land grants, and unsettles all those payments, leaves them for future adjustment.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I meant to say was that if the laws are as the honorable member supposes them to be, if Congress has by law authorized and directed the Secretary to go on and make those payments, we cannot afterward call in question the validity of those payments, and all that the amendment suggests is that hereafter this matter is to be adjusted—adjusted of course upon the law as it is and the facts as they may turn out to be. Certainly it cannot be the purpose of this amendment to interfere with any payment which Congress has authorized to be made.

Mr. BROWN. The Senate will perceive that in the language of the proviso as incorporated in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives is this phrase: "except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress." That is the assumption that they have been modified, that the payments have been authorized; but if the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania be adopted and the proviso remain as it will then stand it will unsettle all that class of cases. I am opposed to it for that reason if for no other.

Mr. JOHNSON. There can be no objection to retaining those words in the proviso as they came from the House of Representatives. What I meant to say was that whether the words were in or not the result would be the same; but there can certainly be no objection to keeping the words in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, so far as the present railroad enterprises in the West are concerned, will have all the bad effects of the House proposition without any of the present benefits of the House proposition. I am opposed to the amendment and also to the original proviso; and I express a dissent to this policy with very much reluctance, because my views are not in accordance with those of a colleague of the House of Representatives, for whose opinion, as a legislator and a lawyer, I have a very profound respect. But, sir, I prefer to leave this question where it has been since the war, with the War Department. I am not prepared to say that the arrangement between the Government and these railroad companies has been an unjust or an inequitable one. A deduction, I understand, is made of thirty-three per cent. from the pay of these companies, because of the aid the Government gave in the construction of the roads. I suppose that the Secretary of War has looked over the whole subject, and has come to the conclusion that, in view of the investment that the Government made and of the investment that the stockholders have made, that is fair and just, and I am willing to leave it to his judgment. I am not prepared to say that the construction of the act of 1850 granting lands to the State of Illinois, which this proposition assumes to be right, is correct. The language is, "And the said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States," (the right to use is made free,) "free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States."

Mr. JOHNSON. The road itself was made under a charter granted by the State of Illinois, and under that charter nobody could use the road except the company itself; that is to say, the cars and the locomotive power were to belong to the company. Nobody was authorized to run a locomotive on it or put cars on it without the consent of the company; but when we, in the law, give to the United States the right to use the road, it is to use it as it is, to use the locomotives and to use the cars. At least I think that is the interpretation. Otherwise, merely to give to the United States a right to use the road, and to deny them the right to have the use of the locomotives and cars, would destroy the very purpose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not express any opinion conclusively arrived at as to the proper construction of this act, but the language itself gives to the Government the use of the road, and the Senator from Maryland thinks that that carries with it the use of the rolling stock. But, sir, in what I have to say on this subject I do not intend to discuss it with reference to the strict construction of this language; the question is, what is fair? The Department has adopted a policy which I think is a fair policy. I do not undertake to say that thirty-three per cent. is the exact deduction that ought to be made. I do not undertake to say that the same deduction ought to be made in the State of Missouri that should be made in the State of Illinois in view of the grant that was made to the roads in the different States; but that an arrangement ought to be made between the Government and the companies with a view to the business that the Government now requires, taken in connection with the grant that the Government has made and also the contribution made by the stockholders to the construction of the road, is fair and right. I think there are equities in the present condition of the country that ought to be respected, and I think the War Department has attempted to respect these equities.

It is suggested that the War Department has merely paid under protest. If this law is to be strictly construed, and it carries the right to use the rolling stock as well as the road, then the Secretary of War had no right to pay anything, and he has made a payment without authority of law, and his protest amounts to nothing. If his protest means anything it means "I am paying money here without authority of law, and I protest against my own acts;" so I choose to consider his protest as amounting to nothing, and as not affecting the arrangement made upon equitable principles between him and these companies.

Now, sir, what did the Government give to these railroads? Take the original grant to the State of Illinois, made in 1850, take the grants that have been made to other States, and as the grant was then made it was not of much value. The grant to the State of Illinois was of a wilderness, if I may so express it, of prairie land; a country that was not being settled; a country that could not be settled; so far from the timber that without a railroad that land must have lain waste to this day. The land itself did not and could not build the road. Private individuals had to furnish the means, and then the road was built; and then the lands not only of the State became of value, but the reserved sections of the Government, for the first time in their history, became of value. What is a quarter section of land worth a hundred miles out in a prairie? You might as well ask me what a quarter section of the ocean is worth a hundred miles from the coast. It cannot be used; it cannot be occupied; fuel cannot be carried there except by the use of a railroad. Then this land was comparatively valueless; but as soon as a railroad is constructed through it, that land, the reserved sections that were worth nothing to the Government, that she could not sell, became worth $2 50 an acre, and she realized on them. She did in the case of Illinois and in the case of other States; she gets dollar for dollar what all the lands were worth before she made the grant. Under her policy the lands were worth $1 25 an acre, but when the grant is made and a railroad is constructed the reserved sections are worth $2 50, and sell readily for that. My own observation of the fact is that these lands were sought for, and there was quite a controversy along the line of the Central railroad of Illinois to secure the lands at $2 50 an acre—lands that the Government never could have sold, many of them, except for the construction of this road. Then, I say, the Government is benefited as well as the State. The Government in fact contributes nothing, for she gets $2 50 per acre for half of her land, instead $1 25 an acre for the whole.

The truth of the business, I believe, is that Congress, when this law was passed, had not much reference to the particular language that was adopted. It was supposed, I have no doubt, that the Government would have some use for the road, and provision was made that the railroad company should be required to accommodate the Government; but it was never thought at that time that the country would be in such a condition as that the Government would require a greater use of the road than all the other interests of the country put together.

Now, what is fair in this matter? Take the great Central road of Illinois as an example. Its entire capacity is taxed to carry the troops and munitions of war of the Government. Is it fair toward the stock that was subscribed by individuals to say that the road shall be taken entirely for the use of the Government, and that no compensation shall be made to the men who have invested their money, along with the money that was realized from the sale of the granted lands? I say it is not equitable, it is not just, and I think the arrangement the War Department has attempted to make is a fair arrangement.

But, sir, I do not wish to see the enterprise that the Government within the last year have encouraged entirely defeated. At the last session you granted lands to the State of Wisconsin for the purpose of constructing roads through that densely timbered land in the northern portion of that State; you have extended the grants in Minnesota I believe; perhaps in Kansas also. Now let it be understood that the Government has a right to appropriate the entire road, to cut off the revenues of all other stockholders, and is it possible for these enterprises in the present embarrassed condition of the country to be a success? I think the Government has a large interest in the construction of these roads through the West, and I do not think a policy ought to be adopted or a construction given to this language which will defeat the purposes of the grants of the last session.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am bound to say, with all respect to the origin of this proviso, that I regard it as the most monstrous one I ever found in a bill before this body. It declares "that no money appropriated by this act shall be used for the purpose of paying any railway company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States, when such company may have accepted a grant of lands from Congress on condition of furnishing said transportation free of toll or other charge, except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress." Perhaps I ought to apologize for saying that it was absolutely monstrous, because it is not very certain that the effect which it was expected that this proviso would have will actually be realized. I do not know that there is a company in the United States which ever has accepted a grant of land from Congress upon the condition of furnishing transportation free of toll. Congress has made to various States grants of land upon the reserved condition that the road should be a highway free from toll for the transportation of Government troops or property; but I do conceive that there is a vast difference between declaring a railroad to be a public highway free of toll and declaring that the company which owns the highway shall become forwarders and shall transport Government troops and property free.

Mr. COLLAMER. I ask the gentleman whether, if they did not have any grant on such a condition, they would be foreclosed by the proviso.

Mr. HOWE. It was that very doubt I suggested, whether the proviso, if it were enacted, would have the effect which it is designed to have. If I am right in my construction of the grant, it clearly would not; nevertheless, in that case it would do no good but it would do a great deal of hurt, because it would create this contest between the Government and the companies; it would raise this cloud upon their titles; it would involve them perhaps in litigation; it might have all the disastrous effects upon the companies that the proviso would have if properly drawn. It might cripple them and disable them from going on with their business, and yet the Government might after all have to pay for the transportation of their troops.

Mr. President, if I am wrong on the point of law I cannot be wrong upon the point of what is equity and fair dealing. If there is to be found in these grants a contract, not that the State should leave the road open as a highway, but a contract that the company which might be employed to administer the grant should be forwarders and transporters of Government products, it is still, I say, unconscionable to enforce it upon these roads under the present condition of affairs. When these grants were made, your Army consisted of about thirteen thousand men; it has during this war sometimes reached a million. A contract to furnish transportation for those troops, and the supplies necessary for their support, is a very different thing from saying that they will still furnish transportation for the troops and supplies when the Government shall have turned the whole population of the Union into troops and shall have become the purchasers of the whole products of the nation to supply them. The transportation which the Government could ever require for the Army we then had was trifling in amount; it could impose no great hardship upon any company to undertake to furnish that; but in the altered state of things which we now find, to enforce that same contract is a great hardship. I believe the Government does not stand on any contract made two years ago, as prices then were, does not attempt to enforce any of those contracts now; certainly not where there are any other alleviating circumstances to relieve against the hardship. There is no private contractor that could stand up under such contracts. I know of none.

I am therefore, Mr. President, entirely opposed to the proviso. The amendment which is offered to the proviso and which is the pending question, I understand proposes to allow the Government to go on and pay these companies under the present arrangement, but to still hold out the intimation that it is not after all a payment, but only a loan to the companies, and that the Government reserves the right to recall that loan whenever it sees fit to do so. Thus, as was said by I think the Senator from Indiana just now, you do not relieve the Government from any disbursement, whereas you do impose all the hardships on the companies and all the danger to the enterprises still on foot.

Mr. COLLAMER. I inquire whether that is not the present condition of things. Is not the payment made under protest?

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, I think it is not precisely the condition of things under the present mode of payment. I understand there is a contract between the Secretary of War and these companies by which the Secretary of War stipulates to pay them sixty-six and two thirds per cent. of the ordinary price awarded to other companies.

Mr. COLLAMER. He pays under protest.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that the Secretary of War assumes to pay that under protest, or as he calls it under protest, by which I understand him to say that he does not mean himself to foreclose any right the Government may have under the original grant, but to let the case stand. The companies, in consideration of the conditions of the grants, relinquish voluntarily thirty-three and a third per cent., and the Secretary acting for the Government pays them sixty-six and two thirds per cent. of the ordinary price; and he accompanies that by the declaration that he does not mean to foreclose the rights of the Government under the grant, which he could not do. What possible effect his protest can have on the character of that payment, or the fact of that payment, I do not understand; but if it has any effect whatever, it is mischievous, I think, and only mischievous, and I would not like to have the Congress of the United States do a thing or say a word to increase the mischiefs. I think it is mischievous, because I think it is holding out a distinct threat that a hardship may be enforced hereafter. What will be the effect of it, and the only possible effect? If there is any one company or any two or three companies doing a large amount of forwarding for the Government, so that they will be advanced under this proviso as amended millions, it is held out to the public as a debt constantly accumulating against that company; and when it gets up to the sum of millions what is the condition of the company? It is advertised as a bankrupt, and it becomes the merest piece of stock-jobbing in the world. The only chore to be done then is for enterprising men enough to get hold of the stock to make it an object to bring it up again to par, and to let your Legislature confront the holders of that stock and then see which is the strongest, whether you will enforce the debt or will release the debt. That is the only effect, as I conceive, that it can possibly have.

I believe it is honest to pay these companies. The Senator from Indiana has told you a gospel auth: these grants instead of impoverishing the Government have benefited the Government. Every acre of land you have dedicated to the building of a railroad has been the best expenditure of an acre you have made; and, having already received a full and ample and rich equivalent for every acre you have ever granted, it is not just in the Government, I do not say generous or magnanimous, to stand upon a condition so hard and intolerable as this is.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would rather hope that this amendment would not be pressed to a vote this evening, because I desire to look a little more carefully than I have been able to do at the act of Congress already referred to and other acts of similar character, to arrive at the just construction of the law itself.

Mr. COLLAMER. If the gentleman will indulge me a moment, if he wishes time I will move an adjournment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no speech to make in regard to it.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senator says he desires to look at it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There were laid on the table some papers which I think it would be well to have published, but I shall not ask that this bill be laid over on my account until next week, because I shall not occupy more than a few minutes in what I have to say. Unless the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge consents to its going over, I will not ask it on my account.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a few moments to the act itself, to the very terms of the grant. It seems to have been conceded by quite a number of Senators who have spoken on this subject, that by the law the terms of the grant were upon condition that the company should transport, should carry the property and troops of the United States over the road; that it should furnish the cars; that it should furnish the necessary hands to handle the property, and the engineers, conductors, and brakemen to run the trains. I was a little surprised to hear that construction put upon the law, and I was more surprised when I heard one gentleman after another rise and give that as the true meaning of the law. I think an examination of the statute shows that that is not the law, and if we were sitting here as judges, and the case was now presented for our determination, when we came critically to read and look at the law we should find that it was not thus written.

Now, sir, what are the terms of this grant? "And the said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway." What is a public highway? Is it a road that the owners of the highway are compelled to transport people upon? This road is by act of Congress declared a public highway, for what? "For the use of the Government of the United States." That is what it is a highway for. Now, suppose the grant had stopped there; that the land was granted to the company on the condition that the railroad and branches should be a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, and nothing more had been said, would anybody have contended that there was anything more than a grant to the United States of the right to use it? What is the meaning of a public highway? It means a road that, if it were not restricted by the subsequent terms of the grant, anybody would have a right to use. A public highway anybody has a right to travel over. Here it is restricted by the words "for the use of the Government of the United States." Then the Government has the right, by this grant, to use this public highway. These are the very terms of the grant. Thus the law is written, that the Government may use it, and there is no such word in it as that the railroad company shall transport this property. The road is to be a highway, free to the Government of the United States to use it—that is the word; to "use" it for what? To use it "for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States." There is not a word in the grant about the company being compelled to transport the troops and the property of the United States.

What is a railroad? Does a railroad consist of brakemen, and engineers, and conductors, and locomotives? Is that the meaning of the term "railroad"? It is the "railroad" and its "branches" that are granted for the use of the United States free from toll in the transportation of any property or troops of the United States, not in the transportation by the railroad company. Can it be said that the right exists here to compel the railroad company to furnish engineers, and conductors, and brakemen, and the necessary hands to handle the property of the Government of the United States, because the Government of the United States has reserved the right to use the road as a public highway for certain purposes? The Government of the United States cannot use it for all purposes, but simply for the transportation of the property or troops of the United States; and another clause of the grant provides that "the mails shall be transported on the said railroad under the direction of the Post Office Department at a price which Congress may fix."

So, sir, I deny the construction put upon this law. I say that if you are to give any meaning to the term "public highway" and the language of the act itself it does not compel the company to transport over this road. But, says the Senator from Michigan in reply to this, "Oh, but it meant something; everybody cannot run their trains on the road, and if the United States put a car upon the road there will be collisions." Why so? It is not to be presumed that the Government of the United States in the exercise of one of its rights will so use the roads as improperly to interfere with the rights of others. You might just as well say that there would be collisions on the turnpike roads of the country because the Government of the United States has its mail carried in a coach over a turnpike road. I suppose the coach that goes along bearing the United States mail, when it meets a team coming in the other direction turns to the right hand and they pass each other as the local laws regulating the use of the road direct, just the same as if the coach did not belong to the Government of the United States; and I suppose if the Government of the United States put a car on one of these roads they would have to run their car in accordance with the regulations adopted by law for the running of the road.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable Senator from Illinois will give way for a moment, I will make a motion to adjourn. It is evident that we cannot get through with this bill to-night.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not going to prolong this debate unless others desire to do so. The Senator from Ohio has charge of this bill, and I do not wish it put over on my account. I have said about all that I desired to say, which was to meet the position which seemed to be taken for granted in this body, to my utter astonishment, that this law imposed upon the company the necessity of furnishing all these employes and all this machinery to carry the property of the United States. It does no such thing, in my judgment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust not. This is the only appropriation bill before us yet undetermined, and I think we can soon have a vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I can have any assurance that there is to be a vote, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we can have a vote now.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COWAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN. I think about the only effect that will be produced by this amendment will be to reduce the value of railroad stocks and railroad bonds in the market. If this amendment shall prevail and the railroad companies shall be compelled to carry all this property free of charge, many of the companies will have to give up business. The Secretary of War could seize the roads and run them himself, I suppose, under existing laws; but this would only embarrass the roads and reduce the value of this property without any resultant advantage to the Government. None of the railroads now in the course of construction have derived any great advantage from these grants of land. There is but one railroad company named that has derived any considerable advantage, and that is the railroad in Illinois styled the Central railroad, and I suppose this whole measure is intended to strike at it. I am unwilling that the roads in course of construction in Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan shall be damaged for the purpose of extorting justice from that company, if it would indeed be just to that company, which I gravely doubt.

It was said by my colleague—and for his judgment I have very great respect always—that that company derived some thirty million dollars advantage from the railroad grant. If so, the General Government derived $30,000,000 advantage from the construction of that road. The Government retained alternate sections of land lying along the line of that road, and put up the minimum price to double the previous minimum price. If, then, the railroad company derived $30,000,000 in value toward the construction of the railroad from the land granted by the General Government, the construction of the road has already realized to the Treasury of the United States $30,000,000, either in money or in the resulting advantages growing out of the settlement of an otherwise uninhabitable country; and if any one will take the trouble to look at the condition of Illinois preceding this grant, and its condition when the last census was taken, he will perceive in what the Federal Government has derived advantage. The population of Illinois was augmented between 1850 and 1860 over eight hundred thousand people. A very large per cent. of that increase was owing to the construction of the Illinois Central railroad, by which vast sections of country in the central part of Illinois, remote from the Wabash and Illinois rivers, were brought into market and into a condition where they became desirable to people emigrating to the Northwest. If it had not been for the construction of this railroad Illinois would now be a State of far less consequence than it is in the aid it is able to render in the prosecution of this war. It now has been able to turn out some two hundred regiments of able-bodied men to engage in the contest which is being waged against the rebels. In this, then, we derive an immense advantage from the grant of land made to Illinois to aid in the construction of this railroad. First, we sold the land at double the minimum price previously fixed on it by Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me suggest to the Senator that according to my recollection many of the Government reserved lands on the line of that road were sold for over $2 50 an acre.

Mr. HARLAN. They could not have been sold for less than the minimum price of $2 50 an acre, but I doubt not many of them were sold for more than that amount. If the Government had chosen to withhold those lands from market and put them in market only as the railroad company exposed its lands for sale, they would have realized in dollars the whole amount the railroad company has realized from the sale of its lands. The Government, however, chose for satisfactory reasons to put the reserved sections into market in advance of the sales of land made by the railroad company, and may therefore have realized a less amount in dollars; but they have received an advantage in other respects. They have received an advantage from the augmentation of the wealth of the country thus caused. They are now realizing under the internal revenue laws an immense amount of money from month to month that would not otherwise have been derived from that part of our country. They have realized an immense augmentation of the military strength of the country by the grant, and in various other ways the Government have been advantaged. The whole consideration that they originally stipulated has been realized.

Then if this were intended to apply only to the railroad in Illinois, justice as it seems to me would require that the amendment should be rejected; but in striking at that company, you strike at all the railroad companies in the States I have named that have not the pecuniary ability to withstand the shock. And I may say to my friends from New England that their people are as deeply interested in this subject as ours in the Northwest. We derive a local advantage from the construction of these roads, but the money, the capital, is derived from their constituencies. A very large proportion of the money invested in these roads is derived from the old States; and if you enact laws here that tend to depreciate the value of railroad stocks and railroad bonds, you strike at your own constituencies.

I do not believe that the Federal Government will realize any advantage from the amendment proposed, and in my judgment it will greatly damage the gentlemen who are now actively engaged in constructing these roads in the sparsely populated portions of the Northwest; and hence I must vote against the amendment and for the proposition of the Committee on Finance to strike out the proviso.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know that what I rise now to say is entirely in order, but as the subject of these railroads is progressing with such rapid speed, I wish to say that I submitted a resolution a little while ago that was objected to and not considered, which contains certain statements of fact, and I now declare in the presence of the reporters and of the country, that if assurance can be given to the witnesses that the hand of military power will not be laid upon, but that they shall be allowed to give their testimony freely, I believe I can prove what is alleged in the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. You are too late, sir; I have done.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Grimes, Hale, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sprague, and Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nye, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Davis, Farwell, Harding, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, and Wade—12.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. COWAN. I have but a word to say upon that question. Certain gentlemen mistake utterly and entirely the purport of this amendment and the spirit in which it was made. It is not made as a strike at the railroads at all. It is made, if possible, to reconcile all the various conflicting parties here upon some common ground, and to allow the question to go over to a future time for adjustment. Certainly it would be far better for the railroads to have this amendment as it is presented here than that they should have the proviso put in by the House of Representatives, or that they should have the action of the War Department, being paid under protest, with the threat of a suit hereafter. I am utterly astonished that they should object to this amendment. What does it do? It gives them a chance hereafter to have an adjustment of all these things which they now charge as reasons why they should not do this work for nothing.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, I think it throws the additional doubt or protest of Congress against these railroads. We are told now that the Secretary of War authorizes the auditing and allowing of sixty-six and two thirds per cent. of the usual price paid on other railroads to these land-grant railroads; but he says in the contract that he does not decide their ultimate right to the money.

Mr. COWAN. He pays it every time under protest.

Mr. HARLAN. A legal protest will be the effect of the manner in which it is paid. The Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to remedy this by casting the additional protest of Congress against these railroads; for that is the effect of his amendment—that Congress does not admit the right of these railroads to receive anything. The Secretary of War does not admit their right, but pays them two thirds of what is paid to other railroads. Congress makes an appropriation.

Mr. COWAN. I did not yield to the honorable Senator to make a speech.

Mr. HARLAN. I desired to state the point of difficulty in my mind; but I will wait until the Senator is through.

Mr. COWAN. I do not wish to provoke debate. I offered the amendment in good faith to reconcile two parties here. Here is a party on my right who insist that this is a subsisting contract, and ought to be enforced specifically now. Here is a party on the other hand who insist that the railroad companies should be released and discharged from it, and that the question should be decided now. The whole meaning of the amendment is to let the question go over for adjustment hereafter, when we shall have time to listen to all the parties and take everything into account.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish to be understood on this point. As before stated, the Secretary of War directs two thirds of the ordinary amount paid to other companies to be paid to these land-grant railroad companies, but does it under protest, not admitting on his part that they are entitled to anything. The Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to remedy that and make it better for the railroads by calling on Congress to say the following:

Shall be subject to future adjustment between the United States and said companies, it not being intended to admit the right of said companies to compensation for such transportation.

That is, he will throw the weight of the doubt of Congress into the scale also against the companies. If there is any doubt now in the mind of the Secretary, I do not wish to have that doubt strengthened by putting it into an act of Congress, and thus throwing the weight of the congressional doubt into the scale against these companies. That is the whole effect of the amendment he proposes. If it is doubtful now, let the companies remain under that doubt; let us not attempt to adjudicate against them, and throw a doubt on our part against them. As I think, they are not receiving any more than they ought to receive. The rate of compensation now being received was fixed early after the commencement of this war. It is much less, I believe, than the railroad companies charge private individuals for transporting like goods. It was fixed early in the war before the price of commodities had risen in the market and before the wages of employes had risen. It is two thirds of that low compensation that these land-grant railroads are now receiving under this decision of the Secretary of War. That is little enough, in my opinion.

Relief has been given to certain railroads in Missouri. I protested against that as partial two years ago. You passed a law granting them full compensation as fixed by the Secretary of War, making no deduction. I thought that was unjust to the railroad companies building railroads in Iowa running parallel with these Missouri roads, because they were to some extent in competition with each other in the money markets of the world. I thought it unjust to take money out of the Treasury and give it to them, which was not given in like quantity to the railroad companies in Iowa that were rival companies. But now the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to throw additional burdens on these people who are now in the market buying iron at the immense price that it bears, and hiring men at the high wages that labor commands in the market, to throw additional doubt on their right to this trivial compensation, to throw these additional burdens on them when they need assistance most. It seems to me it will be very unfair to these companies to adopt this amendment. It certainly will not have the effect the Senator supposes, but the reverse.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cowan, Foot, Howard, Johnson, Nesmith, Sherman, Ten Eyck, and Wade—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nye, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Collamer, Davis, Farwell, Grimes, Harding, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question returns on the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I cannot vote for this amendment. I prefer rather to hold these various companies to the bargain which they have made, by accepting the grants of land from Congress in the terms in which they are made. I hold it to be the duty of these companies under the statutes granting the lands to do the transportation of the troops and property of the United States whenever they are called upon to do that act. I can give this clause in the statute relating to the Illinois Central railroad and to the various other railroads no other interpretation; and I am convinced that if this question shall ever be raised fairly and squarely in a properly enlightened court of justice or equity, that that will be the decision of the tribunal, and that they will be held to do that transportation free of charge of any kind whatever.

My friend from Illinois differs with me in opinion as to the construction to be given to this clause of the act, and insists that the whole extent of the privilege retained by the United States is that of running their own cars over the mere track of the road after it shall have been constructed by the company, and of course running their own cars at their own expense and by employes paid by themselves, and consequently by no means under the control of the company itself who owns the track of the road. It seems to me that this construction of the act is entirely destructive of the purpose and object of the act itself. Why, sir, it says to the United States, when it presents its regiments, its brigades, its divisions, and its corps of the Army to be transported from one place to another for the purpose of prosecuting this war, "True, you are permitted by the act of 1852 to place your men in your own cars and place your cars thus loaded upon our track, and when you are on our track it is your privilege to pass your men to this or that or the other point, wherever you are going; but if you use our cars and not your own, you must pay us whatever amount of charges we may see fit to impose, and the whole extent of your exemption is that you need not pay for the rolling of the iron wheels upon the iron tracks."

I can give the act no such absurd construction. I am willing to say that if a case shall arise which shall operate hardly and severely upon the companies who are called upon to do this transportation that it would be a debt of honor on the part of the United States to relieve them from that hardship; but when it is put to me as a matter of law, as it is now put, that these companies are exempted from the duty of transporting our troops and goods free of charge as part and parcel of the consideration of the land which we have given to them, I cannot pass it by and by my vote admit that they owe no obligation except that of merely the privilege of passing over the iron track.

It is said by my honorable friend from Iowa that we are making a thrust at the credit of the railroads themselves when we propose to retain to ourselves the rights which we claim were retained by the acts of Congress. I do not understand that we are making any thrust at the credit of the railroads. We are simply holding the railroads which now exist, and those which may hereafter exist, to the bargain which they have made with us. If we find it a hard bargain, and desire relief, let them come and present their applications to Congress, and we will relieve them; but I do not feel justified, by the erasure of this provision from the bill, in suffering the state of things which has existed heretofore still to exist in the War Department. I do not feel that it is our duty to suffer the Secretary of War to proceed and pay these roads whatever sum he may see fit to pay them for the transportation of troops and goods upon their road, which, in my judgment, ought to be transported free of all charge. If we suffer this to go on further the railroads will turn around upon us and say, not only with plausibility, but with legal force, that having had all these facts before our eyes, and having suffered this state of things to exist, and suffered our Secretary of War to settle and pay these roads, it is our duty still to continue to pay them; that we have acquiesced in this absurd construction of the acts of Congress; in short, that we have waived all objection to their claim, and are therefore bound by it. I choose to reserve my rights. I am willing to be liberal and fair with the roads; but I will not give up what is to me an obvious construction of an act of Congress merely for the sake of peace and quiet with these corporations or any other corporations.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nye, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wilkinson, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Farwell, Hale, Howard, Nesmith, and Wade—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Collamer, Davis, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Harris, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sautsbury, Ten Eyck, and Van Winkle—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws which give additional pay or rank to officers of the regular Army over officers in the volunteer service of the same rank are hereby repealed.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to have the Senator explain that amendment. I do not understand the purport of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The object of it is to break down the distinction between the officers of the regular Army and the officers in the volunteer service. I hope we may go even further than this. I want the distinction between the officers in the volunteer service of the United States and those in what is called the regular Army abolished; and this is one approach toward it. There is a sort of feeling in the Army, which I think has been very prejudicial to the public service, arising out of these two organizations; and I think if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will mature a bill that shall break down all distinction between the regular forces, so-called, and the volunteer forces who have become regular forces, that we shall accomplish a great object. This is the beginning of it. I wish now to start and destroy the distinction as to pay or as to rank in consequence of a man's being in the regular service. If a man is in the volunteer service who has been a colonel just as long as one in the regular service has been a colonel I want them to rank together. I do not want a junior regular officer to outrank a senior volunteer officer.

Mr. NESMITH. I should like to ask the Senator one question: what distinction is there between officers of the regular and volunteer service of the same rank now?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The distinction is this: that if there are two officers of the same rank the regular officer takes command of the volunteer. The distinction is again this: where a regular Army officer is brevetted, and has a command corresponding to his brevet rank, he has the pay of the rank to which he is brevetted; and where a volunteer officer is brevetted and performs the duties appertaining to the brevet rank, he does not get the pay. I want to break down all such distinctions.

Mr. ANTHONY. How does this amendment work? Does it take away the pay from the regular officer, or give it to the volunteer officer?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It puts the regular officer on the same footing with the volunteer, and it takes the pay from the regular officer.

Mr. WILSON. I do not understand that there is any distinction now between the regular officer and a volunteer officer in any respect whatever. We passed an act the other day providing that there should be none.

Mr. WILKINSON. Then there is no objection to this amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to it except that there is no distinction whatever between them in regard to pay, rank, or emoluments.

Mr. WILKINSON. This will do no harm. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HALE and Mr. WILKINSON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am in ignorance upon this subject. I do not know wherein a regular officer is paid any more than a volunteer officer of the same rank.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have stated that he is in case of brevet rank.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Is that the only case? I will yield to any one who will give me information on the subject.

Mr. BROWN. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that there is a difference, by the construction of the War Department. Where brevets are given to officers in the regular Army they carry with them pay; but they do not carry pay when they are given to volunteer officers.

Mr. WILSON. We have abolished that distinction.

Mr. BROWN. We abolished it, I believe, by passing a bill to that effect through the Senate; but it has not passed the House of Representatives, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. WILSON. It was provided for in the report of the committee of conference which we acted upon a day or two ago, and it is now settled.

Mr. BROWN. I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is the case, I ask the Senator from Illinois what is the object of the amendment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is one case; but I understand this also to be the construction at the Department, that a regular officer commands a volunteer Army officer of the same date of commission, and I do not know but even when he is of junior date; but according to my understanding—and if I am misinformed I shall be glad to be corrected—if there are two officers of the same date of commission, one a volunteer officer and one in the regular Army, the regular Army officer takes command as a matter of course.

Mr. WILSON. And he ought to do so if he has been in the service longer. Here is the law and the rule laid down in the regulations:

"When commissions are of the same date, the rank is to be decided between officers of the same regiment or corps by the order of appointment; between officers of different regiments or corps: first, by rank in actual service when appointed; second, by former rank and service in the Army or Marine corps; third, by lottery among such as have not been in the military service of the United States. In case of equality of rank by virtue of a brevet commission, reference is had to commissions not brevet."

If a man is appointed in the regular Army a captain, and on the same day a man is appointed a captain in the volunteers, and they happen to meet, neither of them ever having served at all, it is settled by lottery; but if the regular officer has been in the service before in some other rank, of course he outranks and takes command of the volunteer officer. There is a perfect equality in rank, pay, and emoluments between the officers of the volunteers and the regular Army under the bill that we passed the other day.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The reason that induces me to favor this amendment is this: it will place these officers upon precisely the same footing hereafter. Gentlemen say there is no difference now. I understand this to be the case: you take an officer from civil life and appoint him in the regular Army; he has never seen service; and you place him above the officers who are sent from your States in the volunteer service, who have raised companies and regiments and brought them into the field, and rendered the country more service than those who have received the mere appointment from the President.

Mr. NESMITH. I desire to say to the Senator from Illinois that no officers are appointed to the regular Army from civil life.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Senator no doubt thinks that is so; but we confirmed the other day a lieutenant in the regular Army, from the Pacific coast, from civil life.

Mr. NESMITH. He was not taken from civil life. He was in service in the volunteers at the date of his appointment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe the law now requires that men shall be appointed from the service into the regular Army; but, sir, one half, yes, two thirds, of the officers in the regular Army, so called, to-day, come from civil life. I know a great number of them myself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If my colleague will allow me, I think I can read from the same book from which the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs read, what will satisfy him. I will read a single sentence:

"Officers serving by commission from any State in the Union take rank next after officers of the like grade by commission from the United States."

I should think that was pretty clear.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That was the very purpose I had. It was to place our volunteer officers on precisely the same footing as officers that were appointed by the President of the United States.

I desire to state another thing, that Senators may have no misapprehension as to my position. I state here distinctly that no army ought to be confided to the command of any man who had not received military education along with military service. Men may be of equal ability, but when you come to apply the education to the service of the country, it is of vast importance; and I have not been, and am not now, for placing the volunteers any further than it is necessary to do in the command of armies. I think it would be far preferable, if we had the material, to make our colonels of regiments even from the regular Army. But, sir, there is no reason why you should take a civilian and place him in the regular Army, and give him advantages over the civilian who is elected by his regiment and goes into the field after he has performed service.

Mr. NESMITH. The regulations of the Army provide that when officers of the same rank are brought into contact, their commissions being of the same date, some one must be selected to command. That establishes the rule. The officer who has seen the longest service, without reference to their present position, supersedes and takes command of the officer who has been most recently appointed. That distinction is established between the regulars and the volunteers; or, in the language of the article of the regulations which the Senator from Illinois has read, where an officer of the United States Government, commissioned by the United States Government, and an officer of a State government come together, the officer of the United States shall take the command, on the supposition that he has been longer in the service. It is a general rule which applies to everybody. I suppose practically it has not been resorted to perhaps half a dozen times during the present war. Not a single instance occurs to me now where an officer of the regular Army and of the volunteer force of the same date of commission have been brought in contact, and where a conflict of jurisdiction or as to the right to command has arisen. I think, as a matter of expediency, where two officers are brought together with the same date of commission, the presumption of capacity and ability is in favor of the officer who has been the longest in the service. I do not think the question ought to be meddled with or any change made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire slightly to modify the amendment which I offered, by adding the words "or regulations of the War Department." The amendment provides that all laws or parts of laws giving precedence to regular Army officers over those in the volunteer service shall be repealed. I wish to modify it by adding, "or regulations of the War Department," so that it will read:

And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws, or regulations of the War Department, which give additional pay or rank to officers of the regular Army over officers in the volunteer service of the same rank, are hereby repealed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I think this is too important a measure to be discussed or be decided with so limited a number of Senators present; and therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon that I wish to say it is so important a proposition that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs tells us it is now the law; and there is no difference between the two gentlemen except that one insists there is a military regulation that in a certain case may possibly give a preference to a regular officer. I do not think we are required to delay action on this important bill by the pending amendment. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Rhode Island will withdraw his motion, and let us take a vote and pass the bill. I do not wish to stand in the way of other Senators on Monday.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I withdraw the motion. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn; and the question returns on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CONNESS. I am at a loss, and ask the Senator from Illinois to enlighten me, in regard to the amendment. Suppose there shall be a volunteer officer and an officer holding rank in the regular Army, of equal grade and equal time of commission, and they shall appear in a given place, and it shall become necessary for one of them to take command; there is a command that both cannot exercise, and therefore there is a necessity that one of the two shall be designated; is it not necessary that there shall be a rule on the subject?

Mr. TRUMBULL. This amendment does not repeal the rule. I would leave the question to be decided just as if two officers of the regular Army met, of the same date of commission. The regulations provide for settling that. All that my amendment provides is, that because the one man is a volunteer he shall not necessarily be put under the regular officer, and that the question shall be settled the same as it is between regular Army officers.

Mr. CONNESS. Then my objection to the amendment is this: although it may be true, as stated by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] that some civilians were appointed from civil life into the regular Army, yet the regular Army contains all the persons that we educate at West Point; and, as a general rule, it is more safe that they should outrank and take command, when there is an equality of rank otherwise, than that the volunteer should take it. The passage of an amendment of this kind would be a discrimination against them. If it can be held that it would not be a discrimination against them, then it is an unnecessary offense offered to them, and therefore it is objectionable to me.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to say a single word in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from California. I would place General Hancock by this provision in the regular Army precisely as he is to-day in the volunteer service. He is, I apprehend, one of the most splendid officers in our Army. He is a major general of volunteers, and he is commanded to-day by his juniors who are in the regular Army, who have graduated long since he has, and seen less service than he has. This is what the amendment of my colleague does; and it does nothing more. It leaves the regular officers in the Army, whether they are major generals of volunteers or of the regular Army, to assume the position precisely that they have occupied and ought to occupy from the date of their commissions and from the term of service.

Mr. WILSON. That is the case at the present time so far certainly as General Hancock is concerned. General Hancock is appointed by the Federal Government, nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. If he meets a major general of the regular Army of the same date of commission the question as to who shall command is to be settled according to the rules; but there is a provision, and I think it is a new one that has been adopted since the commencement of this war—

Mr. WILKINSON. It is an old one.

Mr. WILSON. I say I think the rule is a new one, for this reason: I was present early in the war when this question was discussed, and the doctrine was maintained by General McClellan and other general officers that there was no distinction whatever between the volunteer and regular officer, and that commissions dating on the same day must be governed by the same rule. The rule, as I have stated it, applies certainly to the regular Army. The ninth section referred to by the Senator from Illinois does subordinate the man bearing a commission from a State to a man bearing a commission from the Federal Government; and as a general rule it would be best for the service of the country that it should be so. I agree with the remark made by the Senator from California, and there is no doubt or question on that point, I think.

Mr. WILKINSON. I think the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs must certainly be mistaken in his recollection. I offered a bill at an early period of this war to bring about this very result.

Mr. WILSON. For the consolidation of the two?

Mr. WILKINSON. No, sir; but to abolish the distinction between the regular and volunteer armies of the Union. I was called upon by several prominent military men in regard to it, and they stated the rule precisely as I understand it, and as it appears from the regulations as read by the Senator from Illinois, that where two officers came together of equal rank, and their commissions were of the same date, the regular officer took the command. I think that distinction ought to be abolished. I can see no reason why a clerk who has been kept in the War Department with the rank of brigadier general through this entire war should rank General Terry, after the military talent which he has displayed in the field. I do not believe in it.

Mr. POWELL. I am very decidedly of opinion that the proposition of the Senator from Illinois should not be adopted. It seems that now, according to the laws and regulations, if two officers of the same rank meet and their commissions are of even date, the officer of the regular Army is to take command. I certainly think that is right and proper. General Hancock, who has been mentioned by my friend from Illinois, and who is certainly one of the ablest and most accomplished of our Army, is a brigadier general in the regular Army and also a major general of volunteers. Suppose his commission as major general of volunteers, and that of General Butler, the hero of Fort Fisher, should bear equal date, and those two men were to meet on the field of battle, do you not think General Hancock ought to take command? He would do it under the regulations as they now stand; and I say it is right that he should do it, because he is a regular soldier.

I am therefore opposed to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois. I think the law is right as it stands. This art of war is one that requires not only education but very great capacity. It is not more than once in a century that the world looks upon a truly great military chieftain. He must have great natural abilities and then he must have a military education. It requires the very largest experience and the most extensive education to be a great general. The very idea that you should pass a law that regular officers, whose trade is war, who are educated in all the art of war, should have no preference over volunteer officers when their commissions are of equal date, and when perhaps the volunteer officers only receive their commissions the day before yesterday, in my judgment is absurd. I think the regular and educated Army officer, he who has been trained to arms and seen service, if he meets a volunteer officer on the field of equal rank, should take command, particularly if their commissions are of even date.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Senator from Kentucky, by voting against this proposition, does not accomplish what he seeks to accomplish.

Mr. POWELL. That will leave the law as it is.

Mr. RICHARDSON. He thinks it would be dreadful if a civilian should command a regular officer.

Mr. POWELL. If my friend will allow me, I did not say it would be dreadful; but I think it would be bad policy, where a regular officer and a volunteer officer of equal rank and whose commissions are of the same date meet on the field, not to allow the regular officer to command. If the volunteer was a major general and the regular officer a brigadier general, then I would allow the volunteer officer to command him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If you pass the amendment of my colleague you do away with that difficulty. Major General Butler would command General Hancock if they were to meet on the field to-day. Pass this amendment, and if they meet to-morrow Major General Hancock would command General Butler.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; I beg your pardon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WILSON. It does not alter the case at all; it does not touch it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state to the chairman of the committee that a little experience in this matter is worth a great deal of theory. When you come to settle the rank of officers of the same grade you look back to the prior service, and that would give General Hancock the command to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will allow me, as General Butler is referred to—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Only for illustration.

Mr. WILSON. I think General Butler is the third major general in the service of the United States. He outranks General Hancock, and there is no law and no change that can be made that could put General Hancock over him.

Mr. NESMITH. The Senator from Illinois is proceeding upon the hypothesis that Butler and Hancock were major generals of the same date of commission.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir. It is for the purpose, I have stated heretofore, to show that there is no reason why, because a man is designated as belonging to the regular Army in the particular commission he holds, he should rank an officer of equal skill and equal ability who had seen more service, because he was designated as belonging to the volunteers.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Farwell, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Nye, Ramsey, Richardson, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wilkinson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conness, Doolittle, Foster, Henderson, Nesmith, Powell, Sprague, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wade—23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed. The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

SENATORS FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Charles Smith and R. King Cutler, claiming seats as Senators from the State of Louisiana, have instructed me to make a report on the subject, accompanied by a joint resolution. I move that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The joint resolution (S. No. 117) recognizing the government of the State of Louisiana was read a first time by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the reading of the resolution at length.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the United States do hereby recognize the government of the State of Louisiana, inaugurated under and by the convention which assembled on the 6th day of April, A. D. 1864, at the city of New Orleans, as the legitimate government of the said State, and entitled to the guarantees and all other rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. POWELL. I merely wish to remark at this stage of the proceedings that as a member of the Judiciary Committee I was opposed to the report and the resolution.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 18, 1865.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. JOHN THURSH.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. COLE, of California. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the select committee on the Pacific railroad a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864. It will take but a few moments to pass upon.

Mr. WILSON. I object to its consideration at this time.

Mr. COLE, of California. The bill only extends the time for the completion of a certain part of the road for six months, and I have been directed unanimously by the committee on the Pacific railroad to report it and put it upon its passage.

Mr. WILSON. I will not object if the bill is reported and its consideration postponed so that we may examine it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that postponements will be hard to reach during the remainder of this session.

Mr. COLE, of California. It might be made a special order.

The SPEAKER. Other special orders will antedate it. Business has been assigned for each day for nearly a week ahead.

Mr. WILSON. Let the bill be received, ordered to be printed, and a motion entered to reconsider.

Mr. COLE, of California. Very well.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. BEAMAN, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolutions of the State of Michigan; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

In relation to the improvement of the mouth of the Saginaw river;

Instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives to urge upon the General Government the necessity of establishing a general naval recruiting and muster-in office for the State of Michigan;

Asking the General Government for a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Mineral Range railroad;

Asking an appropriation of lands by Congress for the construction of a wagon road from Escanawba to Sault Ste. Marie; and Requesting the members in Congress to call attention of the General Government to the importance of the construction of light-houses and fog-bells on the straits of Michilimackinac.

RATIONS OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs are hereby directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing that in all cases where less than full rations are issued to the soldiers they shall be paid the value of such deficit in cash.

DISABLED REGIMENTAL SURGEONS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the transfer of such efficient and competent regimental surgeons, who have been wounded or disabled while in the line of their duty to such an extent as to render them unfit for service in the field, to duty as post or hospital surgeons.

PRINTING A BILL.

Mr. ASHLEY. I am instructed by the select committee on the rebellious States to ask for the printing of a substitute for the reconstruction bill, which will be acted on on Monday.

No objection being made, the substitute was ordered to be printed.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL COMPANY.

Mr. ASHLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the Continental Hotel Company of the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

WAGON ROADS IN TERRITORIES.

Mr. ARNOLD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 752) to provide for the construction of certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska; which was read, and recommitted to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned last evening, the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered to be put on the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the question is taken on these amendments, I desire to say a few words.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that the Clerk read over the amendments first, and pass upon the informal ones, and by that time members will be in, when he can make his remarks before taking the vote on the important amendments.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection.

Mr. GANSON. I suggest that the amendments be read over, and that all amendments upon which a separate vote is not required by some member shall be considered as passed. The gentleman from Vermont can then submit his remarks, and the House proceed to consider the amendments upon which a separate vote is demanded.

No objection being made, the proposition was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and they were all agreed to, except those upon which a separate vote was demanded. Such amendments will appear below.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not propose to detain the House more than five minutes. I desire to have a separate vote on the amendment relating to the tax on beer and ale, because I think that when the House considers it they will conclude that the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means is no greater hardship, at least, in reference to that article, than the tax already imposed upon whisky, with which it competes.

In relation to section one hundred and three of the tax bill, as amended by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BROWN,] I will say that it includes altogether too much even for his own purpose, which was to relieve vessels engaged in the lake trade. It will reduce the tax upon railroads from five per cent. to two and a half, and I take it that is not the purpose of any portion of the House. Whatever may have been proper to have done in relation to canal-boats and vessels engaged in our coasting trade, certainly this amendment is altogether wrong. I should be willing to accede to the proposition to make some amendment in relation to the lake, coasting, and canal business, and I have no doubt such amendment will be made in the Senate. It will be time enough to consider that subject when we shall have considered the tariff question; and I presume the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] will be adopted by this House, by imposing a tonnage duty upon at least all sailing vessels.

Mr. PIKE. Why not let it go to the Senate?

Mr. MORRILL. Because I consider that no man in this House would be willing to commit himself to the proposition now before the House, as it embraces entirely too much, and proposes one thing in order to obtain another.

In relation to the tax on sales, I merely desire to call the attention of the House to the subject for a single moment. I think we may very well bear the restriction of the tariff upon foreign trade upon the boundaries of our country; but within the vast area of the United States, it is vitally important that we should leave our own domestic trade free. Unless we do that, in my judgment, it will immediately cripple the industry and productions of the country. It is a tax which I do not believe such taxation would stand longer than the first day of the next session of Congress, if it should be imposed; and I say this, although I am as anxious as any man can be to increase the revenue of the Government at the present time.

There was another amendment introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] not now in his seat, in relation to the stamp tax upon land conveyances. I do not think that there can be any doubt about our power to impose the forfeiture. The law as it now stands is well enough, and it will be found in this proviso:

"Provided, That the title of a purchaser of land by deed duly stamped, shall not be defeated or affected by the want of a proper stamp on any deed conveying said land by any person from, through, or under whom his grantor claims or holds title."

It is only necessary to make out a new conveyance with the proper stamp to make good any title granted without such a stamp. I trust that neither the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] nor that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] will be adopted. I believe that it is far better to maintain the existing law, as it is now getting to be understood by our people, than to make these repeated changes without sufficient cause. There is no general complaint in relation to this matter.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman is in favor of maintaining the existing law, I would like to ask him why he is in favor of passing every year a remedial act which is in the face of the existing law, and which gives, contrary to the existing law, validity to instruments from which the stamps have been omitted.

Mr. MORRILL. That has been rendered necessary in consequence of the ignorance of the people that we had a stamp law. When it shall come to be thoroughly understood here in this country as it has long been in England that all of these instruments must have a stamp, it will then be possible for us to remove the severity of the penalties that are now imposed. But if it is the purpose of Congress to collect any considerable duty upon stamps, it is indispensable that we shall maintain this provision. I think it would at least rob us of half our revenue. Parties in business who could rely upon the honor of one another that they would take no advantage of the penal statute would, of course, go on with all kinds of business and there would be no remedy for it; we should be utterly incapable of enforcing any penalty upon parties who might have ever so numerous transactions daily, each one relying upon the honor of the other that they would not be pursued by any penalties, and thereby the Treasury would suffer, as I think, immensely.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and there is no man in this House who has a more hearty admiration for the vigorous intellect of the gentleman from Pennsylvania than myself; but I will say, as he said of me yesterday, that if this proposition had not been presented by him, I would have regarded it as absurd.

Mr. Speaker, when a patient becomes so low as to adopt quack medicines, his case becomes a desperate one, and I regard this measure as very much in the nature of a quack medicine. Let me call the attention of the House for a single moment to the utter absurdity of this proposition.

The gentleman proposes to tax all sales of gold unless it be for the purpose of paying duties or for exportation. That would prevent even the miner from selling the coin which he produces. It would operate mischievously in all of our gold and silver-producing States, where they have no currency but gold and silver, and all business is conducted on the basis of coin.

Mr. STEVENS. I have already modified it so as to except "miners of the precious metals." And the gentleman will allow me to say that I intend to ask liberty before the vote is taken to modify it so as to suit my own absurd notions. [Laughter.]

I propose to add the following:

Nor to any person who has received gold or coin for interest on the public debt and sells the same, nor which was received in the regular course of business other than by traffic in coin for speculative purposes.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know what the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to do. I must take the bill as I find it.

Now, sir, suppose that a jeweler desires to purchase coin for the making of silver spoons for a girl about to be married, under this bill there would be the penal sum of ten per cent. imposed upon the purchase. So, too, the dentist could not buy coin or gold for the manufacture of teeth without paying this penalty. The use of the precious metals except for duties on imports and for exportation would be prohibited. The gold-leaf manufacturer would be taxed out of existence, and so of all others who make use of silver in the manufacture of plate, trimmings, &c.

The gentleman has stated that the revenue to be derived from this source would amount to $3,000,000 per day if the whole tax should be collected. Now, if that idea should be adopted, of course we would collect $1,095,000,000 a year on this article!

Mr. Speaker, I trust that the vote to-day will show that the vote given on yesterday was given in mere good nature, and that when we come to record our serious opinion, it will not go on to the record for any such proposition as this. We have tried these extravagant penalties, and they have miserably failed as they always will. A tax of $1,000 is imposed for a license as a gold and bullion broker. We imposed such a license tax as that upon that unpopular class of our community who deal in lottery tickets, and it was found utterly impossible to enforce it; we cannot impose any such duties upon officers who can be made to obey them. The parties will never be reached. Many of the men engaged in the business of brokers are as high-minded and as honorable as any to be found in our whole country. We all remember the distinguished gentleman from New York, a member of this House at the last session of Congress. I do not suppose it to be the intention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to reach such parties, and yet I do not see how they can escape.

Mr. Speaker, I am gratified that the House has with so much unanimity agreed upon a bill which I think will be efficient and capable of sustaining the Treasury in this its greatest hour of need. I trust that we shall have nearly if not quite a unanimous vote for this increased taxation. I believe that this is a step in the right direction to reduce the price of coin; and when we have adopted the true remedy I hope we shall not pursue any that is false.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent now to modify my amendment before the vote be taken on it.

Mr. BROOKS. I object. Let us take the whole medicine at once.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to modify it.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. KERNAN. I concur in that, if we can get a separate vote also on section eleven.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] will not put me to the necessity of moving to reconsider. If he does, I will make the motion.

The SPEAKER. The ordering of the main question cannot be reconsidered at this time, it having been partly executed. The rule is that it is not in order to move a reconsideration of the vote ordering the main question when it is partly executed. This has been partly executed; and it is therefore not in order to move its reconsideration, a number of amendments having been passed upon under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I will have my amendment modified in the Senate if it pass the House.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on which separate votes had been demanded, as follows:

Sixth amendment:

Strike out the following paragraph:

That section sixty-four be amended by striking out "one dollar," wherever it occurs, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one dollar and fifty cents."

The section to which the paragraph refers is as follows:

Sec. 64. And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors, by whatever name such liquors may be called, a duty of one dollar for each and every barrel containing not more than thirty-one gallons, and at a like rate for any other quantity, or for fractional parts of a barrel, which shall be brewed or manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, within the United States or the Territories thereof, or within the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRILL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 68, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Blow, Brooks, James S. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, Radford, James S. Rollins, Ross, Spalding, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, Townsend, Wadsworth, Ward, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Blair, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Frank, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Jencks, Philip Johnson, Knott, Law, McBride, McDowell, McDoe, McKinney, Middleton, Nelson, Orth, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Scott, Sloan, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Voorhees, Webster, Chilton A. White, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—42.

So the amendment was adopted and the paragraph was struck out.

Pending the roll-call,

Mr. COBB stated that his colleague, Mr. McINDOE, was absent on account of sickness, and his colleague, Mr. SLOAN, absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. ALLISON stated that his colleague, Mr. GRINNELL, was absent on account of illness.

Mr. BAXTER stated that Mr. ORTH was absent on account of illness.

The result was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ANCONA moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Eighth amendment:

In paragraph forty-nine, insert after the word "manufacturer" the words "and no other;" so that it will read: 49. Miners shall pay for each and every license the sum of ten dollars. Every person, firm, or company, who shall employ others in the business of mining for coal, or for gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, zinc, spelter, or other minerals, not having taken out a license as a manufacturer, and no other, shall be regarded as a miner under this act.

The amendment was rejected.

Ninth amendment:

In paragraph fifty-one, after the word "license" insert the words "and, in addition thereto ten dollars for every substitute procured by them and actually mustered into the service of the United States;" so that it will read:

51. Substitute brokers shall pay $100 for each and every license, and in addition thereto ten dollars for every substitute procured by them and actually mustered into the service of the United States. Every person who shall furnish, or offer to furnish, for pay, fee, or reward, volunteers, representative recruits, or substitutes for men drafted, or liable to be drafted, for the military or naval service of the United States, shall be deemed a substitute broker under this act.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SHANNON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the eighth amendment, on page 11, to insert the words "and no other" in relation to the tax or license upon miners, was inadvertently non-concurred in. The House evidently did not understand the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. It makes no difference. It only makes the language awkward, without adding to its sense.

Mr. SHANNON. It does make a great deal of difference with some assessors and collectors. It does not change the provision at all; it simply makes the law explicit and plain, so that every man can understand it.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The amendment was then concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution against any recognition of the rebel debt or loan under any circumstances; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House, House bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866; and

An act (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

TAX BILL—AGAIN.

Thirty-second amendment:

Strike out the following:

And not mixed with leaf or leaf and stems, and on fine-cut, and shorts, and scraps of tobacco, the refuse of cigars manufactured, and also on all scraps or refuse of plug manufactured, when sold for smoking tobacco, or for consumption, or otherwise.

So that the paragraph, if amended, will read:

On smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems, fifteen cents per pound.

Mr. MALLORY called the yeas and nays upon concurring in the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I want the provision reported by the Committee of Ways and Means adhered to.

Mr. MORRILL. The other part of this provision was amended in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment has been concurred in.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 66, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. And insert in lieu thereof the following:

That section one hundred and three be amended by striking out the words "two and a half per cent. upon the gross receipts," and inserting "two and a half per cent. upon the net receipts under $3,000, and five per cent. upon the excess."

That portion of section one hundred and three proposed to be amended is as follows:

Sec. 103. And be it further enacted, That every person, firm, company, or corporation owning or possessing, or having the care or management of, any railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal-boat, or other vessel, or any stage-coach or other vehicle engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or property for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, or any canal, the water of which is used for mining purposes, shall be subject to and pay a duty of two and one half per cent. upon the gross receipts of such railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal-boat or other vessel, or such stage-coach or other vehicle.

Forty-ninth amendment:

On page 33, commencing with line eight hundred and five, strike out the following:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That every bullion broker shall take out a license, and pay $1,000 therefor, whether he operates at the brokers' board or elsewhere. Whoever deals in gold or coin, as above stated, without first having obtained such license, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, besides, forfeit and pay the sum of $2,000, to be recovered in a qui tam action, the one half to go to the prosecutor and the other half to the United States. Whoever shall buy or sell gold or coin, or bargain to buy or sell the same at or for any price above the Mint value, whether such purchase or bargain be executed or not, each of the said parties shall pay a duty or tax of ten per cent. on the full amount or value of said purchase, sale, or bargain; and if the said bargain, purchase, or sale, should be sold, assigned, or transferred to others, such assignor and assignees shall pay ten per cent. on the full amount of said transaction.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That every such sale, or bargain to sell, shall be deemed to be above the Mint value if more than one dollar in legal-tender notes, or in the notes of any bank, company, or individual, shall be exacted, taken, paid, or received at less than one dollar in gold or coin.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That every bullion broker shall make out and return to the assessor of his district a full and true statement of all his transactions in gold or coin within twenty-four hours after such transactions shall have taken place; in default whereof he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall forfeit and pay the sum of $500 for each offense, to be recovered as provided for in the second section of this act, unless he shall have been unavoidably prevented from making such return.

SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SCHENCK also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 690) for the better organization of the subsistence department, with sundry amendments to the first section, as follows:

The first amendment was to insert after the words "each separate army in the field consisting of more than one Army corps" the words "to each military department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the words "pay and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of the subsistence department" the words "and to each Army corps an officer of the subsistence department to be chief commissary of the corps, with the like rank of lieutenant colonel."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "rank, pay, and emoluments" before the words "shall cease," and insert the words "increased rank, pay, and emoluments allowed because of such assignment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "at least two thirds in the grade of" in the second proviso of the first section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The section as amended reads as follows:

That, during the continuance of the present rebellion, the Secretary of War may, when in his judgment it is necessary, assign to each geographical military division, to each separate army in the field consisting of more than one Army corps, to each military department, and to each principal subsistence depot, not exceeding ten in number, an officer of the subsistence department to act as chief commissary of such military division, army, military department, or depot, and also an officer of the subsistence department as assistant in the office of the Commissary General of Subsistence, each of whom, while so assigned and acting, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of the subsistence department; and, in like manner, may assign, for purposes of inspection or other special duty in the subsistence department, commissaries of subsistence, not exceeding six in number, each of whom, while so assigned and acting, shall have the temporary rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of the subsistence department; and to each Army corps an officer of the subsistence department, to be chief commissary of the corps with the like rank of lieutenant colonel; and, in like manner, may assign to each division of two or more brigades a commissary, who, while so assigned and acting, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major of the subsistence department; Provided, That when any one of said officers is relieved from such duty, his increased rank, pay, and emoluments allowed because of such assignment shall cease, and he shall return to his commissioned rank in the subsistence department: And provided further, That the officers authorized to be assigned by this act shall be selected from the commissaries of subsistence who hold commissions or rank in the volunteer service only: And provided further, That when within the limits of any geographical department there shall be not more than one Army corps, in such case the chief commissary of the Army corps shall perform the duties of the department commissary.

The second section provides that the President may appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as many commissaries of subsistence of volunteers, with the rank of captain, as the exigencies of the service may require.

The following additional section was reported from the committee:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The section was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REFUGEES' AND FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. SCHENCK also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 698) to establish in the War Department a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill was read at length.

The first section provides for the establishment of a bureau in the War Department, relating to refugees and freedmen from the rebel States, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War and approved by the President; the bureau to have one chief, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, at a salary of $3,000 per annum, and not exceeding two clerks of the fourth class, two of the third class, three of the second class, and five of the first class.

Section two authorizes the President to assign to the bureau, for the benefit of refugees and freedmen, the temporary use of such lands and tenements in insurrectionary States, not belonging to loyal owners, as may be necessary; and to direct such issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of refugees and freedmen, and their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

Section three repeals all conflicting laws and parts of laws.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will explain this bill in a few words. It is the same bill upon which some comment was made, and in regard to which some explanation was given, on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs, when we had under consideration the other day the report of the committee of conference in relation to the Freedmen's Bureau. The committee of conference have reported, and that report has been adopted by this House. We have no notice that that report has been agreed to by the Senate; and there now hangs in the Senate, to be determined upon the question whether they shall or shall not agree to the report of the committee of conference, the Freedmen's Bureau bill, which has become somewhat familiar to this House—a bill providing for a distinct Department of the Government for the care of blacks who have been freed from slavery.

The bill presented by the Committee on Military Affairs and adverted to the other day in the course of the debate on the report of the committee of conference is one which looks, not to the establishment of a distinct Department of the Government, but to the organization of a bureau within the military Department of the Government; to provide not merely for freedmen—those who have been slaves, those who are of African descent—but to provide also for white refugees everywhere along the borders, including not only those found in the rebel States, but those in any of the States or districts which come within the lines of the operations of our Army, which come in fact within the lines of operations of armies either of the rebel States or of the United States. This bill, thus being broad and general in its character, making no distinction on account of color, is the bill which contains the general provisions prepared upon this subject by the Committee on Military Affairs, and which, I am inclined to suspect, a majority of this House will prefer.

Rising, therefore, only for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the particular bill which we now offer, which was to some extent—indeed I may say fully—discussed and explained the other day, I propose, if the House concur with the Committee on Military Affairs, that we pass this bill, and, sending it to the Senate, leave it to that body to decide between the two systems—either to create a distinct Department, neither in the Treasury nor the War Department; a bureau of neither one nor the other, but an independent Department of itself, to look only after freedmen, or to establish a bureau, as we propose, in the War Department, to look after all refugees of all colors and provide for them at the sound discretion of the Government, under the restrictions contained in the bill.

I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. YEAMAN reported from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill to increase the pay of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The first section provides that from and after the passage of the act the pay and emoluments of all officers in the military service of the United States shall be exempt from all income and war tax.

The second section provides that from and after the 1st day of January, 1865, during the continuance of the existing rebellion, the pay proper of line and staff officers below the grade of brigadier general in the military service of the United States shall be per month as follows:

Colonels of infantry and artillery, $140; lieutenant colonels, $120; majors, $105; captains, $90; first lieutenants, $77; second lieutenants, $70; colonels of all other arms of the service, $165; lieutenant colonels, $140; majors, $115; captains, $102 50; lieutenants, $80 33.

The third section provides for the repeal of the fifteenth section of "An act to raise an additional force, and for other purposes," approved January 13, 1813, and enacts that hereafter whenever any officer or soldier shall be discharged from the service, except by way of punishment for an offense, he shall be furnished transportation from the place of his discharge to his then actual place of residence; or in case transportation cannot be furnished by the Government, then he shall be paid the actual cost of traveling in money.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by inserting after the word "military," in the first section, the words "and naval."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YEAMAN. I have only to say in regard to this bill, which I have been directed to report by the committee, that the passage of such a measure is asked by almost all the officers of the service. The committee have had before them an immense bundle of petitions, a large part of which have been printed. Unless gentlemen desire to discuss this matter I will ask the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. I ask the gentleman to permit me to offer an amendment to increase the pay of the soldiers to twenty dollars per month.

Mr. YEAMAN. I yield to the gentleman to offer that amendment.

Mr. ROSS. I move to amend by adding to the second section "and that the pay of private soldiers shall be twenty dollars per month." On this amendment I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order upon the amendment that has been proposed. The bill refers to the pay of officers. It is confined entirely to the rations and pay of officers. The gentleman must introduce another bill in relation to the private soldiers. I make the point that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The bill is to increase the pay of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes; and in the second section it provides "whenever any officer or soldier shall," &c. It therefore relates to private soldiers as well as officers. The amendment is in order.

Mr. COX. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky to use another phrase than "special war tax." I do not think that that will accomplish his purpose.

Mr. YEAMAN. The language of the bill is, "income or special war tax." I have nothing further to offer; and I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ASHLEY moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. KERNAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 83, not voting 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Branderage, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Eliot, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Kelley, Marvin, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Pike, Pomeroy, Shannon, and Woodbridge—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chauler, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Eckley, Edson, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Farnsworth, Finck, Ganson, Garfield, Griswold, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Kerman, King, Knox, Law, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Marcy, McAllister, McClurg, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Townsend, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Wilson, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—83.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Arnold, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Gravens, Creswell, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Frank, Grinnell, Hall, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kesson, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Lazenby, Littlejohn, Longyear, Mallory, McBride, McDowell, Melndoe, McKinney, Middleton, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Odell, John O'Neill, Orth, Perry, Price, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scott, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Sweat, Tracy, Upson, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Worthington, and Yeaman—80.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask my colleague to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. YEAMAN. I withdraw it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, at the last session of Congress a bill was passed materially increasing the pay of the soldiers of the Army of the United States. They are the best paid and the best provided for of any soldiers of any country in the world at this time. This year the Committee on Military Affairs, feeling the same pressure of obligation to provide for officers of lower grade, below brigadier general, have reported this bill increasing, not in the same degree, not with the same percentage, the pay of those officers, besides giving them certain advantages. It is also to be considered that soldiers have bounties from the General Government, from the States, and from localities, which, taken together, make their pay equal an amount far exceeding in proportion what subaltern officers have.

Under these circumstances, sir, the committee did not feel, in view of the necessities of the Government, of the necessity to provide, on the one hand, for those who are fighting our battles, and the duty, on the other hand, to regard the means of the Government to pay; this being the case, I say, I had supposed that this bill would be permitted to go through as originally intended. It proposes to do justice to a meritorious class of those who are engaged in fighting our battles, the subaltern officers, not heretofore provided for—to increase their pay to what they are entitled to.

Under these circumstances I shall myself vote against incurring this bill with any outside proposition to increase further the pay of the soldiers; and I hope that the bill will pass without any such incumbrance. If gentlemen think what was done at the last session of Congress was not sufficient in the way of increasing the pay of the soldiers, let the distinct proposition be made. Let the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Ross,] or any one else feeling an interest in that matter, test the sense of the House on that direct question.

This question of increase of pay of subaltern officers is one of pressing necessity arising out of some facts which do not apply to the case of soldiers. The soldier not only has his bounty, but his monthly pay was increased at the last session of Congress. By provision of law he has his rations, his clothing, and his arms. He is provided with these things at the expense of the Government, making in the aggregate the actual receipts of privates in the Army more than that of the lowest class of officers. On the other hand the subaltern officer is compelled to provide himself with food, drawing a ration by no means equivalent to the cost of food, his own clothing, his own arms. Many officers are actually unable to subsist themselves in many cases in the field decently and respectably, irrespective of the necessity of providing for their families at home. He is not able to dress and provide himself as his position requires, upon the present pay, in consequence of the depreciation of the currency, and the inefficiency of that pay arising out of the depreciation which comes from an inflation of the currency.

Mr. SMITH. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether from the papers referred to the Military Committee in regard to this subject he does not know that in consequence of the insufficient pay of the officers of the Army, after taking out the income tax required by law, officers who have served three or four years have intimated that they would be compelled to resign unless some relief was given at this session of Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was about to say that in consequence of their not being able decently to provide for themselves in the position assigned to them by the appointment of the Executive, many officers are not only compelled to seek to be permitted to resign, but so far as such resignation could consistently with the interests of the Government be accepted, have been, from the humanity that was appealed to in asking the permission, accepted by the Department. A large number of officers, unable to get the acceptance of their resignations, and a still larger number, unwilling, so long as they could keep body and soul together, to tender their resignation while the war was going on, are in the condition to which I have referred.

I hope therefore the House will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and if there are any gentlemen who think this matter should be acted on, leave it to come in as a separate proposition, and pass this bill for the relief of these subordinate officers.

Mr. YEAMAN resumed the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to offer an amendment which I will explain briefly. It is in reference to acting assistant surgeons of the Army.

The SPEAKER. That is not germane to the pending amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be pending at the same time with the other, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROSS. I must object to any amendment being received until my amendment is acted on.

Mr. YEAMAN. I yielded very readily to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] to offer an amendment, and I now yield for the same purpose to the other gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his objection?

Mr. ROSS. I do.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I offer the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of January, 1865, the pay of acting assistant surgeons in the Army of the United States shall be $125 per month.

At the present time these contract surgeons receive but $100 a month, which is considerably less than that of the assistant surgeons of the Army, though they perform the same duties. The bill, without this amendment, does not include the acting assistant surgeons of the Army, a very worthy and meritorious class of persons. It is impossible to get the requisite surgical skill into the Army for $100 per month. Many surgeons are leaving the Army in consequence of inadequacy of pay.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] to yield to me to make a short statement.

Mr. ROSS. I must object to any further yielding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the right to yield for personal explanation, or for an explanation of the pending measure.

Mr. YEAMAN. I think the matter is well understood, and I insist now upon the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question being first on the amendment of Mr. Ross,

Mr. ROSS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 33, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Chauler, Ambrose W. So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROSS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH's amendment was then agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion to allow me to move that the bill and amendments be recommitted.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be made pending the previous question, which does not exhaust itself until the bill has been read the third time.

Mr. ANCONA. Is the motion to lay the bill on the table in order, having once been voted down?

The SPEAKER. The bill has been changed by amendment since the motion was last made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs with leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. That motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent, as the previous question does not exhaust itself until the third reading of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. Will it not be in order to move to recommit the bill on its third reading?

The SPEAKER. After the third reading that motion will be in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I withdraw the motion to lay the bill on the table at the suggestion of gentlemen around me.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. YEAMAN. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the House will not sustain the previous question. [Loud shouts of "Order!"] I hope the bill will be recommitted. ["Order! "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The question was taken, and there were—ayes 44, noes 73.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the bill as amended be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs with leave to report at any time, and on that motion I ask the previous question.

Mr. COX. I object to the last part of the motion.

The SPEAKER. The last part of the motion requires unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I will leave out that about leave to report at any time.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 63, nays 51, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Rollins, Scott, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Tracy, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, Chilton A. White, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Worthington—68.

So the motion to recommit the bill was agreed to.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is it in order now to direct the Military Committee to report an amendment to increase the pay of the soldiers to twenty-five dollars a month, in lieu of the proposition of my colleague [Mr. Ross] to make it twenty dollars?

Mr. GANSON. Is it in order to annex the Michigan canal bill? [Laughter.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ELIOT asked and obtained leave of absence for the remainder of the day's session.

PAY OF OFFICERS.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to increase the pay of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill is the same as that reported by Mr. YEAMAN, as amended in the House, except as regards the amendment offered by Mr. Ross.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order that this bill has not been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes it has been.

Mr. SCHENCK. The bill has been considered in the committee, and I am instructed to report it.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman whether this is the bill that the committee has considered since it was recommitted.

Mr. SCHENCK. The bill was considered, and I am authorized by the committee to report it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. COX. I make another point of order, that the committee must report the bill with the amendment as referred to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules that point of order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has the right to report this or that bill. It is a matter between himself and the committee. That is a familiar ruling often made by presiding officers.

Mr. ROSS. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to allow an amendment to be offered increasing the pay of soldiers to twenty dollars a month.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope my colleague will put it at twenty-five dollars.

Mr. ROSS. Yes, sir; I am always ready for that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say that the bill which he was reporting back was the one just now referred to it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not say anything about it. I say it is a bill which I am authorized to report.

Mr. PENDLETON. I want to know the number of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It has no number yet. It will probably be somewhere about eight hundred.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, still keeping the floor, I will withdraw the demand for the previous question in order to say that I will not go for any demagogical amendments to be offered by any one. This House and the country understand perfectly well that those who vote against taxes, and who vote against sustaining the Government—[Calls to order.] I am in order. I am addressing the Chair, having the floor for that purpose.

Mr. COX. It is not in order for the gentleman to attack the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] for wanting to increase the pay of soldiers to twenty-five dollars a month. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Illinois is able to take care of himself.

Mr. COX. I do not think he does. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not question the power and capacity of any gentleman from Illinois on either side to make any demagogical exhibition. The House and the country understand it, and I am willing to leave it to them. Their action is of the character of a Dutch auction, where the people bid downward. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSS. You have to vote against it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I did vote against that amendment. I voted against it because I thought it was a mere piece of demagogism; I voted against it because I know that those who shed crocodile tears over the soldiers are about the last persons to provide means for paying them, either by the imposition of taxes or by making the necessary appropriations; I voted against it because while we were here engaged in endeavoring to do an act of justice to subordinate officers of the Army, as we had already done to the soldiers of the Army, God bless them all!

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. More demagogism. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. It was not worth while to be turned from our purpose by any attempt on the part of gentlemen who have been against the war, against the soldiers, against supporting the Government, and against all the necessary provisions for carrying on this Government in this its time of trial and peril. That is the reason why I voted as I did. Moved by these considerations, and determined to have justice done both to the soldiers and to the officers; determined to have their needs provided for; determined to enable them to go on and fight the battles of the country, and to sustain the Government either against treason in the field or sympathy with treason elsewhere, [cries of "Oh!"] and laughter on the Democratic side of the Hall, I voted as I did. And I shall vote in the same way now when the bill which I have had the honor to report from the Committee on Military Affairs comes up for consideration under the previous question, which I now demand.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to consider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICERS REëntERING THE SERVICE.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 653) to determine the rank of military officers reëntering the military service, with a substitute.

The substitute was read. It provides that any officer who has served in the Army of the United States during the present rebellion, and has been honorably discharged therefrom, and reënters the service, and is recommended with the same rank as before, shall take rank as many days prior to the date of his reëmission as he served with the same rank before he was honorably discharged.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the substitute.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute was adopted.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed and read the third time, it was passed.

The title was amended so as to read, "A bill to determine the rank of officers reëntering the military service."

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF ARMY RATIONS.

Mr. GARFIELD also, from the same committee, reported back a resolution in relation to the increase of Army rations, with the accompanying papers, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ADVANCES TO STATES.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the same committee, also reported back a joint resolution (H. R. No. 391) in regard to the General Government passing a law to assume the debts of States incurred to aid in suppressing the rebellion, with a recommendation that the same do not pass.

The joint resolution was laid on the table.

DISCHARGE OF COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Mr. GARFIELD also, from the same committee, reported back House joint resolution to provide for the discharge of commissioned officers at the expiration of their original term of service, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

The joint resolution was laid on the table.

STUDIES IN MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Military Affairs have also instructed me to submit a written report upon a petition that Doctor Comstock's system of elocution and phonetics and the French system of weights and measures may be taught at the Military Academy. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the report of the committee be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

VETERAN RESERVE CORPS.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of soldiers of the Veteran Reserve corps, praying that their term of service may be computed from the date of their enlistment, have directed me to report that no further legislation is necessary in the case, and move that the committee be discharged.

The motion was agreed to, and the petition was laid on the table.

BREVET SECOND LIEUTENANT.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a petition of officers of colored troops, praying that there be established the rank of brevet second lieutenant, have instructed me to report adversely to the prayer of the petitioners.

The petition was laid on the table.

RECRUITS IN OLD REGIMENTS.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Military Affairs have also directed me to report back some papers in regard to recruits to fill old regiments. The subject has been already acted upon, and I move that the committee be discharged.

The motion was agreed to, and the papers were laid on the table.

MISSOURI STATE MILITIA.

Mr. KNOX, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 650) to place the soldiers of the Missouri State militia on the same footing with other volunteer soldiers in the United States service in reference to bounty and back pay, with a recommendation that it pass.

The joint resolution was read.

It provides that the soldiers belonging to the United States Army, known and designated as the Missouri State militia, shall in all respects be placed on the same footing as other United States volunteer soldiers in respect to bounty and back pay, and that all claims for bounty and back pay shall be audited, allowed, and paid in the same manner and with like conditions and limitations as in other cases of volunteer soldiers in the United States service.

Mr. COX. Many gentlemen on this side of the House desire to know something about this bill. Does it call for an appropriation of money?

Mr. KING. No, sir; it does not. For the satisfaction of gentlemen who desire to know something about the bill, I will make an explanation.

It is a very unfortunate circumstance that the Governor of our State gave this body of soldiers the designation of the Missouri State militia. They are United States soldiers, who were recruited into the Army of the United States. The Governor had nothing whatever to do in raising those troops. The name of the Missouri State militia was given to them in order to contradicting them from the enrolled militia of the State. The enrolled militia compose the whole body of our militia. The Missouri State militia is composed of ten regiments of about a thousand men each—some ten thousand men in all—who were raised under an arrangement between the Governor of the State and the President of the United States; and the agreement was that they should serve only in the State of Missouri for its defense. But they were recruited as United States soldiers. Their widows are entitled now to pensions under the law giving pensions to United States soldiers. But some difficulty has arisen in some of the Departments as to whether they shall be recognized as entitled to back pay and bounty. Some of the Departments to which their claims go recognize their right in this respect, while others do not. With a view to remove all difficulty on the subject, I was requested to introduce this bill. Its passage will be an act of sheer justice, not to State militia, but to United States soldiers.

Mr. COX. The explanation just given by my friend from Missouri [Mr. KING] does not altogether satisfy my mind. I think that the House, before passing a bill involving the expenditure of so large an amount of money, ought to have some more explicit explanation.

Mr. KNOX. As I understand, Mr. Speaker, the Missouri State militia are unfortunate only in their name. The Governor misled the public by calling them the Missouri State militia, when in fact they were volunteers, mustered into the service of the United States for three years, like the volunteers from other States. These men have done service out of the State as well as in the State.

Mr. UPSON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KNOX. I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. UPSON. Does this bill place this militia upon the same ground, so far as back pay and bounty are concerned, as other volunteers who enlisted at that time in the United States service?

Mr. KNOX. So I understand. I call for the reading of the bill for the information of the gentleman.

The bill was again read.

Mr. WILSON. Will this apply to the militia of Missouri who have been on service in that State during the time of their enlistment?

Mr. KNOX. These men have been out of the State during a considerable portion of the time. They have been under the orders of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WILSON. I have reason to believe that a considerable number of the militia of Missouri have been on duty at or near their homes, on duty in the same county in which they reside, and that in many cases they have been able to attend to their ordinary business almost as well as if they had not been in the service. If I have been misinformed I should be glad to be corrected.

Mr. KNOX. This bill only contemplates paying the men who have been under United States officers in the United States service.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, the Missouri State militia are under the control of United States officers. They are under the control of the Secretary of War. They have never been under the control of the Governor of that State. They are not of that class known in Missouri as the enrolled militia. The enrolled militia are such as the Governor calls out temporarily. These were recruited for three years, and mustered regularly, upon muster-in rolls, into the service of the United States. They have been to all intents and purposes United States soldiers. They have always been subject to the order of the commander of the department of Missouri. They have never been in any manner subject to State control.

The only misfortune of these men is, that the Governor of Missouri when raising that class of men saw proper to give them, to contradicting them from the enrolled militia to which the gentleman just now alluded, the name of the Missouri State militia. The enrolled militia are a different class of soldiers. No one in Missouri pretended that the enrolled militia, who were raised for six and nine months, are entitled to any bounty or back pay.

Some of these men I will say have obtained their back pay already, as well as their bounty; but the opinion of some one in some of the bureaus in some one of the Departments has thrown some obstacle in the way which makes explanation necessary.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask one question. If these soldiers have been in the service of the United States under the same regulations and doing the same duty as other soldiers, why is it that this legislation is necessary?

Mr. KING. For the reason I have given, that some objection has been raised in the Department. They were paid for two years, and then their pay was stopped.

Mr. UPSON. On what ground?

Mr. KING. At one time they were confounded with the enrolled militia. The Pension Office refused to pay them pensions under the act of 1862; but when the Commissioner of Pensions had his attention called to the law under which they were raised and to the fact that they were recruited in the United States service and not in the service of the State of Missouri, he set aside the order by which they were prohibited from receiving pensions, and they are now, sir, drawing pensions under the act of 1862. Now if they are not entitled to pay, they certainly cannot be entitled to pensions.

Mr. KNOX. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. KNOX. I withdraw the demand for that purpose.

Mr. COX. I would like to know whether this militia of the State of Missouri has ever been called to go out of the State for service.

Mr. KNOX. They have been repeatedly.

Mr. COX. I understand that they never have been.

Mr. KING. I will state that this militia have traversed all that part of the State of Arkansas over which our military have been marched in going down to the southwest part of Missouri.

Mr. COX. I would inquire of the gentleman from Missouri how much money it will probably take to pay the extra bounty under this bill.

Mr. KING. I cannot tell. Very much of it has already been paid. I can make no estimate of how much it will take; but whatever it is, we think the soldiers are entitled to it.

Mr. COX. The answer of the gentleman is very satisfactory. [Laughter.] I would like, however, to have this bill referred back to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KNOX. I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. When will it be in order to make a motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. Not at any time, if the previous question is sustained.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question; and appointed Messrs. Knox and Cox.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 45.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. KNOX. I demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMITHERS. Would it be in order to move to recommit?

The SPEAKER. It will be if the previous question is not seconded.

Mr. LOAN. Will it be in order to make any modification of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. LOAN. I propose that the bill be so modified as to make the appropriation apply at the same rate as is allowed to other officers enlisted at the same time.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. UPSON. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. CRESWELL. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX. I would like to make a suggestion to the friends of this measure. I do not think we fully understand the question; certainly not the Military Committee.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to debate.

Mr. KING. I desire to make a suggestion, but not to debate it.

The SPEAKER. Suggestion is debate. There are two undebatable questions pending.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If by unanimous consent the bill can go back to the Military Committee, I shall not object.

Mr. KING. That was the suggestion I desired to make.

Mr. COX. That was what I wanted.

No objection being made, the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KING. With the privilege of reporting it back at any time?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to that.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION WITH WASHINGTON.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to facilitate railroad communications with the capital of the United States.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but was interrupted by—

Mr. PENDLETON, who inquired if this was the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is, for information.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object to the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question then is, "Shall this bill be rejected?"

Mr. PENDLETON. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It has not.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule under which the decision is made.

The Clerk read the 117th rule of the House, as follows:

"The first reading of a bill shall be for information, and, if opposition be made to it, the question shall be, 'Shall this bill be rejected?' If no opposition be made, or if the question to reject be negatived, the bill shall go to its second reading without a question."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understood the bill was read a first and second time without objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only follows the decision of his predecessors upon this point. The first and second readings of the bill are taken together simply to save the time of the House, and if any question is raised, the reading of the bill is always considered as the first reading.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suppose it has already been perceived by the members of the House that this bill contains not one cent of appropriation. It simply authorizes the Northern Central Railroad Company of Pennsylvania to build a lateral branch from its main line from the point of intersection between the city of Baltimore and York, to the city of Washington.

A gentleman asks if the bill has been printed. I suppose that enough has been said and enough has been printed upon the subject of railroad communication with the city of Washington to render it unnecessary that a bill of this kind should be printed. It is a plain, simple, ordinary railroad bill, authorizing this railroad company to extend their line to the city of Washington, and providing that they may obtain the right of way in Maryland in the same manner as they are authorized by their charter to obtain the right of way under a condemnation of property. It requires the company to build one track of the road within one year, and to complete the double track in two years. It fixes the fares for passenger traffic at not exceeding three cents per mile. It requires them to stock their road with first-class cars, equal to the best cars on the best railways in the United States, and to maintain a first-class rate of speed upon the road; and it requires that the road in all its equipments shall be a first-class road in every respect.

Mr. GANSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the State of Maryland has empowered this company to extend their road through the State?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not think the gentleman understood me to say so, because I did not say it.

Mr. GANSON. Well, I ask the gentleman if he did.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, sir. The only reference I made to the State of Maryland was in relation to the condemnation of the right of way. This bill provides that this company may obtain the right of way from its main line through that portion of the State of Maryland through which it will pass in the same manner as the law of Maryland provides that the right of way shall be obtained.

Mr. GANSON. I would ask if this company has made any application to the State of Maryland for this right of way.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not know that that is pertinent to the question now under consideration.

Mr. GANSON. If they have not, there is no use in Congress interfering.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Whether they have or have not does not affect the question. There can be no doubt about the constitutional power of Congress to pass a bill of this kind. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!"]

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a grave doubt.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, if gentlemen insist upon these doubts, then I must say that they must be judicially blind upon this question. [Cries of "Ah!" and "Oh!"] A question which has been over and over again settled by Congress and by the courts, it seems to me, ought to be satisfactorily settled to the members of this House.

I did not rise, however, for the purpose of discussing the constitutional question. I take it for granted that the members of the House who believe that we have the power to pass this bill, and believe in its necessity, will vote for it, and that those who still have doubts about the constitutional power will probably vote against it. I know there are some men here a good deal like a member of this House from Virginia whom I once read about, who, being dangerously ill, on his death-bed, in giving some directions for his funeral, whispered to one of his attendants, "Do not let them bury me at the expense of the Government, for I am damned if it is constitutional." [Laughter.] I have no doubt that there are members upon the floor of this House who still believe in the unconstitutionality of Congress doing anything which will benefit the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as the hour is getting very late, and as we desire to make some further reports from the Committee on Military Affairs, I call the previous question on the motion to reject the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. When would the previous question exhaust itself?

The SPEAKER. Upon the pending motion, the motion to reject the bill. If the House should refuse to reject the bill, it would go to its second reading without question.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, sir; I cannot.

Mr. THOMAS. Do I understand that the gentleman from Illinois will not allow me to make an explanation in reply to the one which he has submitted?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Not upon the motion to reject the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope my friend will not persist in that.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman will have an opportunity to make his explanation hereafter.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to do it now. I merely want to respond in a very few words.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The motion itself is an unusual motion—to reject a bill on its first reading.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I hope, as the gentleman refuses to yield, the House will reject the bill.

The question being on seconding the previous question,

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. FARNSWORTH and THOMAS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-seven, noes not counted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH withdrew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. THOMAS. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Illinois, that there were circumstances preliminary in this question, which I thought addressed themselves very forcibly to his sense of fairness, against the propriety of urging action at all on this bill now. I will recapitulate these circumstances in the full expectation that he will yield to their force. My colleague [Mr. WEBSTER] is absent. Before leaving here he took the precaution of seeking an interview and of entering into an arrangement with one of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, who has charge of a bill having a much wider purpose than this, a much larger scope, much greater importance in every point of view—a railroad from Washington to the Hudson river opposite New York—but of which this bill was a part. My colleague left here under the full belief that he had made an arrangement under which this measure now up would not be introduced into the House during his absence. But it seems that, without his knowledge or mine, there were two projects before the Committee on Military Affairs—one on the large scale to which I referred, and the one now reported to the House. He has been, and I have been, taken entirely by surprise, because that part of the larger measure in which he takes an interest is now reported to the House, having been separated from the bill of which it was a part. Under these circumstances I did hope that when I made that explanation to the gentleman from Illinois he would postpone all action on the measure until my colleague returned.

That was the first proposition that I desired to submit. I find, however, that the gentleman from Illinois does not respond to that. Still I cannot but insist that there would be propriety in postponing all action on the bill until my colleague returns, because he has given much attention to this particular subject.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. There was no such understanding made with me.

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; I speak of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] It seems there is a mistake in this matter. My colleague supposed, when he had the assurance that the bill for a military road from here to New York was not to be reported in his absence, that he had provided against the possibility of this measure coming up, which is especially interesting to Maryland. But, apart from that, the gentleman from Illinois does not think proper to explain the question. Let us look at it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. By the kindness of the gentleman from Maryland I am permitted to explain. I introduced the bill to which the gentleman refers, for a railroad line between this city and the city of New York. That bill is liable to be called up as a privileged motion, and it was known to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WEBSTER] that I, having charge of that bill, would be likely to call it up. He therefore came to me and requested, as he was about to be absent in consequence of a death in his family, that I would not call it up until after his return. I told him that I would not do so. The measure now before the House is no part of my doings in any way; and I should be very sorry if anything should be done that would appear not to be fair toward the gentleman from Maryland, not now in the city.

Mr. THOMAS. That is precisely the statement that has been made by myself.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is not the same proposition at all.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not say that the gentleman from Ohio would violate, in any way, an agreement with my colleague; but I speak of the fact that my colleague is taken by surprise in the manner in which this proposition is brought before the House.

I would like to have this subject postponed on another ground. I know that the Maryland Legislature have taken action on this subject, and very emphatic and very decided action, and I hope this House will not consider what that Legislature may think in the premises as being unworthy of consideration.

And there are other elements in this question I do not propose to debate, whether it is constitutional or not, because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] is so very confident on that subject that it would require much boldness to differ with him. But I have been most strangely and erroneously educated if this is not in direct conflict with all the received opinions of the country, so far as I have had an opportunity to judge of them. I think it is in direct conflict with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on analogous questions. It is certainly in direct conflict with the deliberate decision of the Administration of President Monroe, embracing as that Administration did some of the ablest men of the country. And we all know that these questions have been talked over and discussed in this country again and again. We all know that in the celebrated case to which I have referred Mr. Monroe, with the full advice of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, and of his entire Cabinet, came to the deliberate conclusion that although the Government of the United States had erected a road from Cumberland, Maryland, to the Ohio river, and had partially completed it beyond the Ohio river, there was no power in this Government to place even a toll-gate on that road for the purpose of collecting tolls for transportation and travel within the limits of the States, and that conclusion was concurred in by the Congress of the United States; for we all know that President Monroe vetoed a bill proposing the erection of these toll-gates, upon the distinct ground that within the limits of a State the Government had no right to impose tolls either directly or indirectly.

And long prior to that it had been the received opinion of the country that this Government possesses no power to create a corporation within the limits of a State. I know this bill is not called a charter in precise terms, but it is one in effect. And look at the strange provisions contained in it. I have never read them, for I never intended to take part in the discussion of this measure. This bill proposes not only to collect tolls, but to appoint commissioners by the Government of the United States to seize the property of citizens of Maryland, and condemn it for the purposes of this road; to take all materials required for the construction of this road and vest them in this corporation. All the powers of the State are swept away. If this be not interfering with the reserved rights of the States, then the States have no reserved rights, and this is a consolidated Government. Sir, whenever any experiment is made,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 58.

in this age, at this day, and among this generation of men, to administer this Government upon any such principles, gentlemen will find that a standing army of five hundred thousand men will always be necessary at the call and bidding of the Government.

But there are considerations apart from that which touch this question very materially and vitally. This is a proposition designed almost exclusively for the benefit of the Northern Central railroad of Pennsylvania, and to injure roads now existing, under the plea of a necessity for more direct and certain communication between this city and New York. We all know that this is especially an attack upon a great and important work of internal improvement between this city and the city of Baltimore. We all know that in response to the just expectation of the country, and in order to enable it to furnish the means of transportation called for by this Government in the present extraordinary condition of affairs, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company has constructed at an enormous expense a double track between Baltimore and Washington. Now, is it right that we should give to another corporation—for this is a corporation, let it be called by what name it may—the power and right to injure if not destroy the improvement which a Maryland company, at the instance of this Government, has made in her own work of internal improvement, in order that it may supply the demand for transportation made upon it by the Government?

What would be proper in another aspect of the case? I remember very well when the Northern Central Railroad Company was known upon the statute-book of Maryland as the Susquehanna Railroad Company. It was once my province, while occupying an official position in Maryland, to be cognizant of the facts of which I am about to speak. This Northern Central railroad was made principally by the means furnished by Baltimore and the State and people of Maryland. Maryland embarked $1,500,000 in that corporation. Without that aid, that corporation could never have been successful in opening communication between the valley of the Susquehanna and the city of Baltimore. It is known, too, that the State of Maryland, after the road had been completed, finding that it was not a very profitable investment for the corporators, made a donation of that $1,500,000, in order to rescue the corporation from the imminent peril of insolvency.

Now, if the State of Maryland is to be deprived of the value of her investment in the road between this place and the city of Baltimore, if Congress can extend the powers of this corporation so as to nullify all the past action of the State of Maryland on this subject, I demand, in the name of justice, that the Government of the United States shall reimburse to the State of Maryland the $1,500,000, which she surrendered, on high grounds of public spirit and patriotism, for the benefit of the corporation that is now seeking to plunder her of her investment.

If the Government of the United States is to legislate in this manner for the State of Maryland, and if the people of Maryland are not to legislate for themselves on such a question, I demand that, as an act of pure justice, the Government of the United States shall take into consideration the entire subject in all its bearings, and reimburse to the treasury of Maryland the $1,500,000 which were contributed to make the Susquehanna railroad, and which Maryland generously and magnanimously released to the very corporators who are now seeking to trample upon her reserved interests through the agency of the Government of the United States.

But there are other considerations in connection with this question. We all know—the gentleman from Illinois as well as myself—that this question of the power of the Government of the United States over such questions as this was largely debated from 1827 till 1836. We all know that the discussion resulted in a verdict by the American people—whether right or wrong I will not say—that such an exercise of power by the Government of the United States was unwise, injudicious, inexpedient; that whether the constitutional power existed or not, it was best for all the interests involved that the power to make roads and canals within the jurisdiction of the States should be left to be exercised by the States in their governmental capacity, or by such corporators as they might think proper to endow with this power.

We all know the revolution that was wrought in this country by that great discussion, and we know what has ensued. Supposing that the policy of the country in this respect was settled, assuming that whether or not there was constitutional power in the Government of the United States to make these roads and canals within the jurisdiction of the States, the Government of the United States, as a mere question of expediency, had concluded to leave the exercise of that power to the States, every State in the Union has made giant strides in the work of internal improvement. Enormous amounts of money have been invested. What is the case of Maryland to-day may be the case of some other State to-morrow. She may be the first victim; but other States may speedily be made to feel this aggression upon their just jurisdiction. Pennsylvania investments may be made void; New York and Ohio and other States may be trespassed upon, one after another.

There are other elements in this question, apart from the matter of the constitutional competency of the Government of the United States. The States have gone too far, private individuals have gone too far, in making their investments under this received opinion of the country, the supposed determination of all authorities to abandon the exercise of this power by the Government of the United States, for Congress now to interpose and undertake to exercise this power, unless they will reimburse every dollar of investment that they render valueless.

This is not a mere question of power or right. It is a question of good faith on the part of the Government. Take that case now with regard to the State of Maryland. I state what I do now under correction, because I cannot state with entire accuracy, for five-and-twenty years have rolled away since I have looked at the books and papers relative to the subject to which I refer. Take the case of Maryland. If you are to destroy altogether one of the valuable investments made by Maryland, one road from here through Maryland, then take our entire internal improvement system off our hands, and do not take that which is most valuable, and leave us that which is of no value at all. One of the smallest States in the Union, Maryland has been the pioneer in the work of internal improvement. The State has been involved to an enormous amount of money in proportion to her extent and population. My colleague on the other side is well aware of that fact. And it required a system of onerous taxation; but now, thank God, Maryland has in her treasury dollar for dollar to pay all of her obligations. When you take this improvement, for, disguise it as you may, that is the effect of this bill, when you take the Baltimore and Washington railroad, take our other investments off our hands; take the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, in which Maryland has a capital invested of $12,000,000.

A MEMBER. Fifteen million.

Mr. THOMAS. I spoke of the amount when I was president of that corporation once, and I suppose that, principal and interest, it will amount now to $15,000,000. That was an investment made by the State of Maryland to the enhancement of every piece of property that the Government has in the District of Columbia. Maryland has $15,000,000 in that great work, this canal, and she has no prospect of a dividend. The prospect of a dividend is so remote that I cannot see when there will be one from that source.

Mr. Speaker, I say apart from the constitutional potency of Congress to exercise this power, there are those questions lying back of it which we cannot lose sight of. We cannot trample upon all the rights of the State and be dead to every sense of justice by interposing what I must call, with all respect, an attempted usurpation of power. Take all of them, if you take any; take off our hands all of these investments in the Baltimore and Susquehanna, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Susquehanna canal, and the Chesapeake and Ohio canal; take all and reimburse us for all, and do not utterly annihilate the only branch of our improvements which has been profitable to the State.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will pardon my desultory manner in discussing these questions, for I did not intend to take part in the debate at all.

But let us look at this matter in sober seriousness. Is such a military road necessary? That is the question. Is there anything in the present or future condition of the country making it probable that we will want this thoroughfare between here and Baltimore? We are in an unnatural condition; and, thank God, we mean to close the present condition of things in such a way, with such emphasis, with such fixed and unchangeable determination, that there will be no danger in any succeeding age that any class of our citizens will create the precise condition of affairs under which we are now living. Let us see whether it is not an unnatural condition of affairs. We have a civil war upon our hands. We have been put to the necessity of transporting troops, munitions of war, and supplies for the Army to the seat of Government; but when the civil war is over, let us see whether there are not improvements of more importance than a railroad from the Susquehanna to the seat of Government, by which more money is to be put into the pockets of the corporators of the Susquehanna railroad in addition to the $1,500,000 given generously by the State of Maryland. Let us see whether this condition of things is to last long. In a foreign war Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Portland, and the sea-board cities of the South will be in danger. They will be in front of the war, and not Washington city. Where, then, are we to get our munitions of war and supplies from? From the interior of the great States of Pennsylvania, New York, Maryland, West Virginia, and from the valley of the Mississippi. There is where they are all to come from; and seeing this there is more plausibility in a proposition to build railroads parallel with the Pennsylvania Central, the New York and Erie, and Boston and Albany railroads, than this cross-road from the Susquehanna to Washington. They are military roads which will be guarded in time of any exigency growing out of war. And if you want to provide for the seat of Government a proper defense, do not look to the interior of Pennsylvania or to Philadelphia, but look to the westward. Maryland, looking westward, has already provided for that; they have given you the corporation called the Metropolitan Railroad Company, contemplating a railroad from Washington to the Baltimore and Ohio road at the Point of Rocks, so that transportation from the West of either men or munitions of war might come directly to the seat of Government without taking the circuitous route by the way of the Relay House. In any point of view, therefore, as a military necessity, this road is not necessary, especially as it could not be completed before the civil war is closed.

I put it, therefore, to the members of this House with sober seriousness and earnestness, whether there is any exigency demanding this measure in the present state of affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would ask the gentleman from Maryland whether he would not be willing to forego all further discussion of this matter now and postpone the subject for a week.

Mr. THOMAS. I was just about coming to that proposition.

Mr. GANSON. I would suggest that a postponement of two weeks would be satisfactory.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would say to the gentleman from Maryland that I desire to get before the House, before the hour of half past five arrives, the bill amendatory of the enrollment law, so that it will come up as the unfinished business on Monday morning. Will the gentleman from Maryland give way for that purpose?

Mr. THOMAS. I most cheerfully yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio; and I move that the further consideration of this matter be postponed for ten days. I do not call the previous question upon that. I never called the previous question in a deliberative assembly.

Mr. PENDLETON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope it will not be postponed beyond one week.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the consideration of the motion to reject the bill was postponed for ten days.

Mr. PENDLETON moved that the vote last taken be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLMENT BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now ask the House to take up the bill of the House No. 678, being the bill amendatory of the enrollment act.

The SPEAKER. If the Committee on Military Affairs have got through with their reports, the next business in order is the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 678) entitled "An act to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, and the other acts relating to enrollment and draft; and upon that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is entitled to the floor.

DISCHARGE OF ENLISTED SOLDIERS.

Mr. L. MYERS, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which under the rules was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House ten thousand copies of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the resolution on the subject of discharging soldiers who have enlisted for the unexpired terms of regiments at the end of such term of service.

REPORT OF GENERAL MCLELLAN.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War, if not incompatible with the public service, communicate to this House the supplementary report of Major General George B. McClellan as to the organization and operations of the Army of the Potomac, and having special reference to the organization and operations of the artillery service.

The SPEAKER. As this resolution calls for executive information, it requires unanimous consent to consider it at this time.

Objection being made, the resolution went over under the rule.

MARY F. B. LEVELY.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, the petition and papers in the case of Mary F. B. Levely, widow of Henry Levely, were taken from the Speaker's table and recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

REGISTERS TO BRITISH SCHOONERS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, by unanimous consent, reported a joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to the British schooners Minnie Williams and E. M. Baxter; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPORT DUTIES ON UNITED STATES GOODS.

Mr. PENDLETON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House of the amount of import duties and charges remitted by his orders since the 1st day of January, 1864, upon goods furnished to the Army and Navy of the United States, together with a description of the goods upon which such duties were so remitted.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 20, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN LANAHAN, D. D. The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair. On motion of Mr. CONNESS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday's proceedings was dispensed with.

RETURN OF A BILL FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to request the House of Representatives to return Senate bill No. 303, for the relief of Charles A. Hichborn, which has passed this body; there is a mistake in it which ought to be corrected.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the Army appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator wish the motion considered now, or merely to have it entered?

Mr. WILSON. I will enter the motion now, and call it up after the morning business is through with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered, subject to be called up at any time.

THANKS TO GENERAL THOMAS.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, there is a joint resolution on the table which has been passed by the House of Representatives and favorably reported from the Military Committee of the Senate, tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Thomas and the gallant officers and men under his command, for late brilliant operations in Tennessee. I propose to call up this resolution with a view to its passage at as early a moment as practicable, as a tribute most deservedly due to those who have evinced such skill and courage in the defense of our country, crowned as that skill and courage was with so much success. But in doing so, I desire that equal justice shall be done to others who have participated in the same operations, and contributed largely by their valor and endurance and promptness to the utter rout and demoralization of the rebel army under General Hood. I allude to the Navy co-operating with General Thomas, under command of Acting Rear Admiral S. P. Lee. I have had in my drawer for some time an amendment tendering the thanks of Congress also to Acting Rear Admiral Lee and the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, and ask leave to present the same and have it printed, that it may come up with the original resolution of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received informally, and the Chair will put the question on the motion to print it.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Governor of the State of Maryland transmitting resolutions unanimously adopted by the Legislature of that State, protesting against the authorization by Congress of any railroad within that State connecting with the Northern Central railroad and extending to the limits of the District of Columbia; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. HOWARD presented a petition of Benjamin Leroy, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan in favor of a grant of lands for the construction of a wagon road from Escanaba to the straits of Michilimackinac, near Fort Mackinaw, and thence to Fort Brady, near the Sault Ste. Marie ship-canal, in the straits of Ste. Marie; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan in favor of an appropriation for the construction of light-houses with fog-bells on the island of Mackinaw, and at or near old Fort Mackinaw in the straits of Michilimackinac; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the Saginaw river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of citizens of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, praying that the act of May 6, 1864, providing for the admeasurement of vessels, may be limited in its effect to ocean vessels, and that the act of March 2, 1799, may be revived and restored to its original force and validity upon the northern lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin in favor of the selection of some point embraced within the harbor of Milwaukee as a site for a naval depot; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of Norman Wiard, praying for the adoption of measures whereby the invention and fabrication of ordnance may be opened to public competition; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in favor of a modification of the act of May 6, 1864, providing for the admeasurement of vessels, limiting its effect to ocean vessels, and that the act of March 2, 1799, may be revived and restored to its original force and validity upon the northern lakes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana in favor of granting pensions to persons wounded and the representatives of persons killed in the defense of that State from invasion by those engaged in rebellion; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY presented additional papers in relation to the claim of M. B. Duffield against the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of Horatio Stone, praying for an appropriation to enable him to complete the statue of Hamilton; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. ANTHONY presented additional papers in support of the claim of Jane Clark; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER presented a memorial of acting assistant surgeons United States Army, praying for an increase of compensation, and that they may be exempted from liability to the draft, and that they be reimbursed for all expenses incurred in the line of their duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented the petition of citizens of the Territory of Colorado, praying the passage of an enabling act giving the people of that Territory the privilege of adopting a State government; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that John Mix Stanley may be remunerated for the loss of his collection of Indian portraits, occasioned by the burning of the Smithsonian Institution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Chicago, Illinois, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the channel of the Muskegon harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 380. I wish to say to the Senate that it is a bill reported on favorably by the Committee on Public Lands, and that when explained briefly by the member who reported it it will in my opinion excite no discussion; and yet it is of great consequence to us that it be acted on promptly here and sent to the other House. It is an amendment to an act of last year which provided for the sale of town lots on the lands of the United States. It is of great consequence to us, and I do not think it will consume much time. If, however, it shall do so I shall not press it on the Senate now.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let us go through with the regular order.

Mr. FOSTER. I am certainly very far from wishing to interpose any objection to the consideration of the bill, but there is another bill which has been commenced and which is the unfinished business of the morning, that is as pressing as this bill can be, for a reason that the Senator well knows. I allude to the bill to establish a circuit and district court in the State of Nevada. I hope that bill will not be postponed. The honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor on it, having been cut short in his speech by the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. CONNESS. I would remind the Senator from Connecticut that this bill was partly acted upon on Saturday morning, more recently than the bill to which he alludes, and although I know that the bill mentioned by him is one of great consequence, I am satisfied that this will not consume much time, if the Senate will let it be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was not agreed to—ayes nine, noes not counted.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on the Library, to whom were referred two petitions of citizens of Michigan and a petition of members of the Legislature of Michigan, praying that John M. Stanley may be remunerated for the loss of his collection of Indian portraits destroyed by fire at the Smithsonian Institution, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) authorizing a contract with William H. Powell for a picture for the Capitol, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print additional copies of the Annual Report of the National Academy of Sciences for 1864, reported it with an amendment substituting "one thousand" for "five hundred," and the amendment was adopted, and the motion agreed to as amended.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a petition of provost marshals in the State of Michigan, praying for an increase in the rank and pay of provost marshals, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 400) to regulate the management of captured and abandoned property in the rebel States, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 398) to repeal the eighth section of an act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July 2, 1864, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the petition of William Hughes, praying payment for improvement of the grounds surrounding Armory Square Hospital, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. BUCKALEW, from the joint committee on the ventilation of the Halls of the two Houses of Congress, submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed; and a motion by him to print three hundred extra copies was referred to the Committee on Printing.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 457) to change the name of the propeller F. W. Backus to that of Metacomet; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 458) to regulate and equalize the expenses of assessors of internal revenue for clerks and stationery; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the bill be printed, and I desire that it lie on the table until tomorrow. I intend to move its reference to the Committee on Finance; but before doing so, I desire to make a brief statement of the facts pertaining to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. WADE. I ask leave to introduce a concurrent resolution, and I desire its present consideration, if there be no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not now in order. A concurrent resolution does not provide for legislation, but is simply in the nature of a resolution of the Senate. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is still in order.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 459) to provide for the consolidation of the Indian tribes, and to establish civil government in the Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 461) to amend the judicial system of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 462) for the relief of the levy court of the county of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENDRICKS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 463) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to the British schooners Minnie Williams and E. M. Baxter.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to submit a motion with reference to the tax bill in order to expedite it as much as possible. I move that it be taken up, and read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that it be printed; and I wish that the printing be expedited as far as possible.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. LUCY A. RICE.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the Senate to take up Senate joint resolution No. 116, relating to Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, late of Richmond, Virginia. It was partially acted on by the Senate the other day, but we did not pass finally upon it. I do not suppose it will take up any time in debate.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to introduce a bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me pass this first.

Mr. WADE. I wish the Senator would let me take up my resolution for consideration. If it takes any time I will drop it.

Mr. HOWARD. If mine takes any time I will drop it.

Mr. WADE. I got mine in first.

Mr. HOWARD. No; mine was brought in the other day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to postpone all prior orders and take up the joint resolution indicated by him.

The motion was not agreed to.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILROAD.

Mr. SUMNER, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 460) to repeal an "Act to incorporate the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company," which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. On the question of reference I desire to make a statement. I have in my hands the charter of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company. The sixth section provides as follows:

"That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States."

The power of Congress, therefore, over that charter is complete. The next question is, whether the occasion has come for the exercise of the power. I submit that it has. The present proprietors of that charter, acting under it, resist daily upon outraging the law of the land, as that law has been declared in this Chamber by eminent Senators again and again, by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] and by the Senator from West Virginia who is not now in his seat, [Mr. WILLEY], to the effect that no corporation is justified in any exclusion from a public conveyance on account of color. That, sir, is the law of the land; but in the face of that positive principle, this successful, rich, and pampered corporation insists upon outraging it daily. I have in my hand an extract from a recent newspaper, which I shall read, as follows:

"EJECTED FROM A STREET CAR.—As car No. 1 was passing along the avenue yesterday morning, at about nine o'clock, a young woman of about eighteen summers called the conductor and asked him if he allowed colored people to ride in his car. He replied he did not, and said he did not know of any colored person being in the car. The young woman told him that the person sitting next to her was a colored woman; whereupon the conductor compelled her to leave the car, she, at the same time, being whiter and fairer than the person complaining of her presence in the car."

There is an outrage of which we have a public record in the journals. But this is not all. I have in my hand a letter from a gentleman in the Paymaster General's office, who writes me under date of February 17, 1865, as follows:

"A few days ago I saw an American soldier in the uniform of his country ejected from one of the street cars of the Washington and Georgetown railroad in which I was a passenger. He was a neat, orderly, intelligent-looking man, whose soldierly bearing testified to his pride in the uniform he wore."

"I know not how many rebels were in that car, for only one expressed herself, and she was loud in denunciations of the 'Yankee Government' and 'the nigger'—an avowed traitor."

"This was a strange spectacle, to a loyal man who has served a full term in the field. I have heretofore omitted to call attention to similar wrongs, hoping that Congress would soon put an end to them."

"I will further add that, beside his uniform, I saw nothing in the soldier that should have subjected him to the outrage, except, perhaps, his color."

There is evidence of the outrage. I have said that the law has been often declared in this Chamber; but it has been declared also from the courts. I have in my hand the opinion of a judge in California, and if I could have the attention of my friend from California [Mr. CONNESS] I should like to call his particular attention to the able and emphatic statement of the law by this learned judge in San Francisco. It is an opinion given as late as this very last month of January, 1865, on an action for damages brought against a railroad corporation for ejecting a colored person from the cars. On that occasion the learned judge, who I name to honor, Judge O. C. Pratt, in a very able opinion, expressed himself as follows:

"The law, however, regulating the rights of the parties, it is the duty of the court to lay before you, and it is incumbent on you to act upon and be guided by it in your deliberations. Should any error be committed in declaring what the law in the premises is the responsibility will be mine and not yours."

He then goes on to say as follows:

"That the plaintiff is one in whose veins flows blood of the African race, or whose skin has a darker color than the majority of other human beings with whom we are daily surrounded in life, in no respect impairs her rights, nor do such blood and color, in any manner, place her outside of the protection of courts and juries when invoked to redress her alleged injuries."

Then after admonishing the jury to approach the question without passion on the one side or the other, the learned judge proceeds as follows:

"Keeping these suggestions of duty fully in view, we charge you, as the law of the premises, that if you believe from the testimony the plaintiff at a reasonable time and proper place applied to defendant to be carried as a passenger in its railroad cars, and tendered the fare which was by law required, and there was manifest to defendant no personal objections to her carriage, other and different from those arising out of her race or color, and her application was refused for that sole reason, and that she was compelled, by sufficient force to effect it, by defendant's servant, against her will, and with defendant's assent, to leave the car of defendant where such application was made, then and in such case such refusal was a breach of duty by defendant, and such ejection of plaintiff was wrongful and unlawful, and entitles plaintiff to damages. In estimating damages in such case you may not only ascertain from the proofs such direct pecuniary losses, if any, directly resulting therefrom, but in addition we charge you, where a duty imposed by law is refused to be performed by one on whom it is enjoined, and such refusal is accompanied with wilful personal injury and insult, calculated to produce bodily or mental suffering, or to cause shame and a depression of spirits as a direct and immediate result of such wilful infringement of rights, the law permits jurors to take such injuries into consideration in computing the damages to which the suffering party is entitled. To authorize this, however, it must satisfactorily appear by the proofs that such infringement of rights has been maliciously committed, or such duty enjoined by law wilfully and maliciously refused to be performed. The rule laid down in the elementary books on this subject is substantially that the sense of wrong or insult in the sufferer's breast resulting from an act dictated by a spirit of wilful injustice, or by a wilful intention to vex, degrade, or insult, may be taken into consideration in making up the quantity of damages in connection with the pecuniary loss."

Sir, that is the common law laid down by a learned judge in California. I thank that State on the Pacific for teaching us here in Washington the law of the land. The jury after listening to this charge returned a verdict of $500 damages for the ejection from the car.

Mr. CONNESS. And that means in gold.

Mr. SUMNER. And the Senator reminds me that that means in gold. Now, sir, I should like to see the corporation that here in Washington defies the law of the land mulcted in $500 damages in gold for every breach of the law; but as the corporation refuses to perform its duties, it seems to me that Congress ought to step in and take from it its charter.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the very authority cited by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to show why this bill should be referred to a committee, is conclusive to my mind that no such reference should be made. He says it is the established law of the land that this corporation shall not exclude any person from its cars on account of color. He cites a judicial decision to show that if such exclusion be made, the corporation is liable in damages. If such be the fact, if the law of the land be as thus stated, if that law has been so solemnly declared, why not leave the person ejected to his action at law? Why, upon the mere report in a newspaper, unsupported by any other testimony, invoke the action of Congress to revoke the charter?

Suppose that to-morrow there is some white passenger on board of any car in any State, according to the report of a newspaper, ejected from a car, would the Legislature of any State deem it a matter of so much importance and worthy of so much consideration at their hands as to revoke the charter of the corporation on that account; or would they not leave the ejected passenger to his remedy (which, according to the Senator is ample) at law? Suppose that to-day or to-morrow a white passenger is ejected from the cars of this railroad company, would any Senator here rise in his place and ask that the charter of the company be revoked; or would he not remit the ejected passenger to his remedy at law? Has it come to this, that when a corporation violates, or is alleged to have violated, its contract with an individual, the powerful agency of Congress is to be invoked, when it is confessed that there is full and adequate remedy at law?

Suppose that any member of this Senate causes to be placed on board of any car a package; suppose he wishes to transmit by any corporation over which we have jurisdiction freight, and suppose the corporation violates its contract with that individual, would you deem it of sufficient importance and worthy of so great consideration that the authority of the highest legislative tribunal in the land must be invoked to redress the wrong and enforce the remedy; or would you leave the person so aggrieved to that remedy which the law already provides?

I do not intend to detain the Senate, but I do think, that considering the amount of the legislation of Congress which is devoted to this negro race, it is time it should stop and that the poor degraded white should have some consideration. Oh, sir, how unfortunate is it that we were born with white skins!

Sir, when subjects of this character are introduced, I think it would well become the Senate of the United States to adjourn and go to some town hall to consider the question and then come back to the Senate Chamber and resume their legislative duties.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask what is the question before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to refer the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] has submitted a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the Army appropriation bill; I deem it important to have that matter disposed of.

Mr. SUMNER. Let this be first disposed of. Mr. BROWN. I want to say a word before this question passes away from the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I have the floor, and I believe I have, I call up the motion to reconsider, which has been submitted in regard to the Army appropriation bill. It is important that that bill should be sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. BROWN. I do not intend to occupy more than a moment's time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think that the motion to reconsider will occupy much time; but I will yield if the Senator desires to speak.

Mr. BROWN. I shall have something to say on this bill when it is reported back from the committee. I desire now simply to thank the Senator from Massachusetts for the persistence which he has shown in bringing this matter before the attention of Congress. When the Congress of the United States have deliberately expressed their opinion on this subject five several times, by five different votes, taken in both branches, declaring that this outrage shall no longer be tolerated, I think it is high time that we should call attention to a corporation which holds its rights under our laws and which persists in violating them. It seems to me that it is a case in which we shall be recreant to our own dignity if we do not take it in hand. I therefore trust that we shall have an early report from the committee on this subject. There is no question, I believe, but what the common law is as stated, nor is there any question that Congress has reiterated again and again its sense that that law should be enforced.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe that upon a motion to refer it is not in order to discuss the merits of the measure. If I am right, I ask for the enforcement of that rule. I do not think this bill should have special preference, just after the Senate has refused to consider the bill which the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] desired to call up, and which was a bill for the relief and benefit of very many of the occupants of the public lands. The Senate, on a vote, refused to hear that bill, not ten minutes ago, and I am not content that the merits of this bill shall now be discussed or at any time until that other bill is considered.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Army appropriation bill was passed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is the bill here?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is here.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know the reason for the motion to reconsider, which the Senator from Massachusetts has submitted; but I wish it disposed of so that the bill may go to the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Massachusetts, I suppose, desires to reconsider it for some particular object. If he will state what it is, we shall be better prepared to know how to vote.

Mr. GRIMES. We always allow a reconsideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Always as a matter of course? If there is no object in reconsidering it I suppose it will not be reconsidered. I should like to know why it is to be reconsidered.

Mr. WILSON. I have moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed for the purpose of making a further motion to reconsider the vote by which an amendment was adopted at the instance of the Senator from Illinois. I believe that amendment, if it be retained, will disarrange the existing affairs of the Army. I think it will do great injustice. By a decision of the Treasury Department I think the amendment, if it be adopted, will immediately affect all the officers of the Army in regard to the longevity ration, and there is no reason on earth why it should be done. That ration was founded in reason and justice and ought not to be disturbed. I have a letter from an Army officer—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to its being reconsidered if you wish to get at that matter again.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes the next question will be on reconsidering the vote by which the amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now the bill is in a position which affords the Senator from Massachusetts an opportunity to make his motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment he refers to was adopted, if he voted with the majority on that question.

Mr. CLARK. I voted with the majority for that amendment, and I will submit the motion to reconsider, not committing myself in regard to it either way, but simply in order to hear what may be said upon the point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion to reconsider the vote by which the following amendment was agreed to, as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws or regulations of the War Department which give additional pay or rank to officers of the regular Army over officers in the volunteer service of the same rank are hereby repealed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am willing to have the vote reconsidered in order to reach the question.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the question recurred on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I will read an extract from a letter which I have received from one of the most intelligent officers in the Army in regard to the effect of this amendment:

"Will you for one moment look at the effect which Mr. TRUMBULL's amendment has on the rank of Sherman, Thomas, Sheridan, and Meade? They were all major generals of volunteers, thus: W. T. Sherman, 1st May, 1862; G. H. Thomas, 25th April, 1863; P. H. Sheridan, 31st December, 1862; G. G. Meade, 29th November, 1862. They distinguished themselves, and upon the presumption that a commission of major general of regulars takes precedence over that of major general of volunteers, by way of reward, they are commissioned major generals of regulars, thus: W. T. Sherman, 12th August, 1864; P. H. Sheridan, 8th November, 1864; G. G. Meade, 18th August, 1864; G. H. Thomas, 15th December, 1864. Now Mr. TRUMBULL's amendment destroys the presumption and eliminates the precedence. What follows? Sherman loses two years two months and twelve days rank as major general, and has placed above him forty-eight major generals who were his juniors when you made him a major general of regulars. Sherman, Meade, and Thomas lose in similar proportion. It is difficult to see the full extent of the mischief of this amendment."

Mr. Brodhead, of the Treasury Department, has decided that volunteers are not entitled to the service ration. Army officers are entitled to it now, and it is believed that the amendment of the Senator from Illinois will at once affect the rights of Army officers. It is no time to enter upon doubtful experiments, and I hope we shall let well enough alone.

Mr. HALE. It is a very strange proceeding if there has been a decision of the Comptroller upon an amendment to a bill that has not yet passed.

Mr. WILSON. Not a decision on this amendment, but a decision on a principle under which it is supposed the adoption of this amendment is to affect the Army.

Mr. HALE. I should like to know how the Comptroller could decide on the principle involved in the amendment of the honorable Senator from Illinois, which was only adopted by the Senate on Saturday night and has not yet gone out of the possession of the Senate. I do not know who wrote the letter which the Senator from Massachusetts read, and I do not care; but I think if the truth was known it would turn out to be a man who feels a good deal more interest for somebody else than he does for Sherman, or Thomas, or any of the other generals named in the letter.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose he has a right to speak for himself.

Mr. HALE. Of course.

Mr. WILSON. I will say that the officer does speak for himself, and in the very letter says that the amendment changes his own relative rank more than five hundred. He is a colonel in the service, and it puts five hundred colonels above him.

Mr. HALE. It must be a wonderful amendment that can produce such an effect! I do not believe a word of it.

Mr. BROWN. And yet he outranks five hundred men who are probably his superiors, because of the regulation of the Department.

Mr. HALE. I do not believe anything of what is alleged here in regard to the terrible effect of this amendment. The amendment is a simple one, and when it was proposed the Senator from Massachusetts at the head of the Military Committee, who of course understands these matters better than most of us, said it had not the least effect in the world; that we had very lately passed a law remedying the very evil to which this amendment seemed to look, and he was astonished that there should be any suggestion that there was any difficulty on the subject.

It is said that the amendment will affect the longevity ration. It will not affect that in the slightest respect. All it does is to put the regular officers and the volunteer officers on the same level, and so it does not affect the longevity ration at all, as I understand. It is a fair and equal thing. If the officers of the regular Army have been in the service longer than the volunteer officers they will have the advantage of it; this amendment does not take it away from them; and I should like to hear some possible explanation of how it is that it is to work such mischief. In my humble judgment it is a wise measure, one that is called for by the interest of the men who are fighting your battles and winning your victories; and the fact which I have elicited and which the Senator from Massachusetts with his usual candor has disclosed, is that the letter is written by somebody for himself, and he brings in General Sherman, and General Thomas, and some of those men who have done so much, to enlist a little sympathy on their account that he may help himself thereby. I think the measure is a wise one and a salutary one, and this fluttering among these gentlemen shows its necessity and its wisdom.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to what has already been said by the Senator from New Hampshire in reference to the longevity ration. The amendment proposed by my colleague, and adopted by the Senate on the last day of our session, only abolishes the distinction that is now kept up between the regular and volunteer officers in the Army. It does not affect that ration. The volunteer officer is not entitled to it, because he has not served five years, which length of service is required in order to get it.

The regular officer who has served for years gets an additional ration for each five years' service, and that is what is called the longevity ration. I cannot see how this amendment can affect it. If that is the only objection to the amendment which has been adopted by the Senate, it is the best reason that can be given to show that there is no other argument against it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think I can explain exactly what the trouble is about this longevity or service ration, and how it was that this decision was made in advance. I seems that by a regulation of the War Department, made, I presume, in pursuance of law, there is allowed what is known as a service ration to officers in the Army; that is, after having served a certain length of time they get an additional ration, one for every five years' service, I believe. The Treasury Department has construed that law as applicable alone to officers of the regular Army, and as not embracing volunteers. Now my colleague says volunteer officers have not served five years. It is true they have not in the volunteer service, but the practice in making up this period of time in the War Department is to add together all the service that has been rendered by the particular person. Take for instance an officer like General Burnside, who once served in the regular Army, subsequently went out of the service, and since this war began entered the volunteer service. I believe he is not now in the regular Army, but if he is, there are many others in his position who are not. The War Department adds together the service rendered by such officers formerly in the regular Army and that since rendered in the volunteer forces, and where it amounts to more than five years proposes to allow the ration; but the Comptroller decides that that does not entitle a volunteer officer to this longevity or service ration; but if the same man was in the regular Army he would be entitled to it. That decision may have been correct; I will not say how that is, because I have not examined the law; but the object in offering this amendment was not to take away the longevity ration from the officers in the regular Army. I think many of them are poorly paid, and I should not be disposed to take away that ration from them. I am entirely willing to add an amendment declaring that this section shall not abolish the longevity ration of the regular Army, but that the volunteer officer shall be entitled to precisely the same thing.

What I am after is to give to the volunteer officer the same rank and the same pay that the regular officer has under the same circumstances. Is there any objection to that? It seems to me there ought not to be. I have drawn up an amendment, which I shall offer to the amendment presently, that I think will accomplish the object and obviate the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts in this respect. I will put it as a proviso in this form:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to abolish the service ration now allowed officers in the regular service; but officers in the volunteer service shall be entitled to the same rations in this respect as if they were in the regular service.

The object of my amendment was not to take away the pay of these officers; and I was not aware, at the time I offered it, that it would have that effect. Nor was it my object to deprive anybody of his rank. The object was merely to bring about a similarity between officers of the same grade and rank and who have served the same period of time. I think that the volunteer officer, a lieutenant, for example, who has served in the field three or four years during this war, ought to rank just as high and is just as valuable to the service as if he had been serving at West Point the same four years. I think the school of the field, marching with his company, camping with them, fighting battles with them, going with them through all the campaigns, is calculated to educate the volunteer lieutenant just as well as he would be educated during the same period of time at the School at West Point; and I would give no preference to a person because he was in the regular service over one in the volunteer service. I think it is prejudicial to the public service to keep up this distinction; and if I knew how, without interfering with existing organizations, to frame a bill that would bring about an entire equality, that would abolish all distinctions between officers and soldiers in what is known as the regular Army and in the volunteer service, I would introduce it and urge its passage. I think there should be no distinction after this length of time.

Now, sir, a word as to the other suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, that General Sherman and others in his position are to be affected by this amendment. We have already passed a law authorizing the President to designate any officer of a particular grade to command an army, and it matters not what the date of his commission is. General Sherman is in command of an army, and every major general in that army, though his commission may be of an older date than General Sherman's, is subordinate to him. This will not interfere with that. There is no trouble about that. Junior major generals are commanding their seniors by designation of the President already. It would make no sort of difference how old was the date of any major general's commission who was placed in the army commanded by Meade, or Sherman, or Thomas; the person assigned to the command of an army commands all the major generals in that army, of whatever date their commissions may be, so that there is no trouble in that respect; and in regard to the service or longevity ration, as it is called, I shall offer the proviso I have already indicated to obviate any difficulty on that point.

Mr. WILSON. I have no quarrel with the Senator's intentions; but certainly if his amendment meant anything it meant to bring the regular officers down and not the volunteer officers up. The amendment speaks for itself.

That all laws and parts of laws or regulations of the War Department which give additional pay or rank to officers of the regular Army over officers in the volunteer service of the same rank, are hereby repealed.

This provision will certainly repeal the service ration of the regular officers. The Treasury Department has decided that the longevity or service ration does not by law belong to volunteer officers. And now a provision is proposed to repeal all laws and regulations that give additional pay or rank to officers of the regular Army over officers of the volunteer service, and that necessarily repeals the service ration. The service ration is founded in reason and in justice, and it ought not, in my judgment, to be interfered with. If this amendment shall be modified so as not to interfere with it the object of moving the reconsideration will have been accomplished. All that I want is to do justice in this matter, to do it to the regular Army, to do it to the volunteers.

I have now a single word to say to the Senator from Missouri in reference to the letter I read. That letter was from an Army officer who has served the country more than twenty years, an officer who has been engaged on the Pacific coast and in the interior of the country, an officer who has been actively engaged for about a quarter of a century in the military service. He has the rank of a colonel, and by virtue of the present law would outrank in the field a colonel commissioned by the Governor of a State. But by this proposed change he is to be outranked by more than five hundred colonels, he having served a quarter of a century and they having served perhaps on the average two years. It appears to me that training and service in the field ought to count something. Senators admit this, and they are very anxious to have training and service counted for the volunteers, but they are not quite so anxious that training and service shall count for officers of the regular Army. I would have service count as much as possible for both. I beg Senators to do no injustice to officers who have served the country for many years with fidelity. It is not necessary to pull down officers of the Army to elevate officers of the volunteers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend the amendment by adding this proviso:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to abolish the service ration now allowed officers in the regular Army, but officers in the volunteer service shall be entitled to the same rations in this respect as if they were in the regular service.

Mr. SHERMAN. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Illinois on Saturday. I believed the principle of it was right enough, and I voted for it upon the declaration of the chairman of the Military Committee that it made no difference; that the rank of volunteer officers now was the same as the rank of regular officers of the same grade; that a preference was only made by assignment of the President. But the amendment now offered by the Senator from Illinois is very radical in its character, and I would much prefer to vote against the whole measure than to have that ingrafted as a part of it. The service ration is totally indefensible in the present condition of affairs, and I am surprised to hear Senators justify it. When it was passed it was intended to supply an additional compensation to officers of the regular Army who had been a long time in the Army without promotion. It was said that officers whose families were growing, and whose expenses, therefore, were increasing, had been retained in the same rank for ten or twenty years; for instance, in the rank of captain, and that the pay of that rank was not commensurate with the increased wants of their families. It was for that reason that an additional ration was given for each five years' service. The intention of that law, in my judgment, was that where an officer was serving in the same rank for five years he should have an increase of pay by an additional ration. That, I say, was the intention of the law; but a forced construction has been given to it which it is not now possible to change except by legislation. It has been held that where an officer of the Army was in the service, say for twenty years, and then resigned and went into private life for ten years, and recently has come back into the volunteer service, his old service in the regular Army shall be added to his recent service in the volunteer army, so as to give him four additional rations. In that way, although he may in the volunteer army draw pay as a major general, he draws service rations for his old service in the regular Army, which he may have left with the rank of captain, although his pay has been vastly increased by his additional rank in the volunteer forces.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator explain how that can happen? The service ration does not apply to general officers. Officers of the regular Army who have been promoted and made general officers get no service ration.

Mr. SHERMAN. What grades get the service ration?

Mr. WILSON. Colonels and all under that rank.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then here is the difficulty: nearly every high officer in the regular Army now holds a very high rank in the volunteers, retaining at the same time his old rank in the regular service. Nearly all your general officers of volunteers hold a rank in the regular Army. Sheridan and some others are now brigadier and major generals in the regular Army, it is true; but many of your best general officers of volunteers still rank as colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors in the regular Army.

Mr. WILSON. They are paid as general officers of volunteers, and not paid as regular officers. A general does not get the service ration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think you will find that, retaining their rank in the regular Army, they get it. At any rate, the only reason for granting the additional ration was that the officers were compelled in the old Army to serve for a very long time in the same rank without any increased pay. I certainly do not desire to see this extended to the volunteers. Indeed, it cannot be until they have served five years. The only reason of the additional ration, as I have said, was to supply the deficiency in the old law by which promotion was so slow.

On the whole, I think it was unwise in the Senate to add this provision to the appropriation bill. We legislated hurriedly on the subject, without full reflection or consideration; and I am therefore disposed to vote against the amendment, leaving the subject to be legislated upon in some proper military bill, at the proper time.

Mr. HALE. I am glad that this subject has come up, and I will suggest to the Senate a remedy, which I have suggested nearly every session for the sixteen years I have been in the Senate, and that is, to abolish the very vicious way that we have of paying our Army officers. I have endeavored on several occasions, and have sometimes got reports on it, to insert a provision to pay each man so much money just as you pay the President, the Cabinet, the Members of Congress, the Chief Justice, and all the judicial officers. I would pay the officers of the Army in the same way; but we do not do that. We have a system of paying by which we introduce a sort of circumlocution, so that the people cannot know, and we ourselves do not know what salaries they get. I think there is hardly a day here that some bill is not introduced by which a particular officer is to have the pay, rank, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry, or a brigadier general in the regular Army, or something of that sort; and to such an extent was that carried that at the last session we created a judicial officer in the War Department, and a serious attempt was actually made to give him his pay in that way, by giving him the pay, rank, and emoluments of a brigadier general, but the good sense of the Senate prevailed.

Mr. JOHNSON. It did not prevail.

Several SENATORS. He got the pay and rank of a brigadier.

Mr. HALE. I am speaking of the Senate when they acted on their own convictions, [laughter,] and not of what they were smuggled into doing on the report of a committee of conference. I say that when the Senate acted upon their convictions they voted down that proposition. It is one of the absurdities, it is one of the ridiculous inheritances we got from Great Britain, and we have kept it. We have got rid of a great many others, but this seems to cling to us. We vote to a man the pay, rank, and emoluments of some officer, and we do not know what the amount is, and when the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has been called upon here to state what the salary was he could not tell us, and nobody can tell us. Sometimes it is one thing and sometimes it is another. I think that until we remedy that we shall never vote understandingly on these propositions.

What is this service ration? I will tell you exactly what it is. It is a provision of law by which the older a man gets, and the less able to render service to the country, the more money he receives. In other words, it is a premium on senility and imbecility; and the more senile a man gets, and the more incompetent to render any service, the more we pay him. That is the philosophy and the reason and the beginning and the ending of this longevity ration. But I suppose a great many men think we cannot get along without it, that we should die if we were to throw off this old remnant of the English aristocracy that has come down to us, by which we have been enabled to deceive ourselves and deceive our constituents.

I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois in regard to the service ration because it is not wanted, it is not necessary. I want to pass the simple proposition that officers of the regular Army and of volunteers shall be paid exactly alike; a major general of the regular Army the same as a major general of volunteers, and so on.

The original amendment of the Senator from Illinois was passed on Saturday night after dark, I believe, and here we are on Monday morning, and already it has been submitted to the Comptroller, and he has decided, not this measure, for it has not been before him yet, but he has decided a principle that exactly hits the case. I should like to see that decision. I should like to know how long it has been the fashion for these executive officers to decide on principles that are to apply to amendments that have not yet become laws. I do not believe a word of it. This is a plain, wholesome provision, and people can understand it; and that is the objection to it. That is what has brought these letters from colonels of the Army and from the War Department, and decisions on principles from the officers of the Treasury. The difficulty is that here is a law that if passed everybody can understand what it means, and that is obnoxious to the censure of the War Department and of the accounting officers. Here is a plain, simple proposition, putting the officers of volunteers and of the regular Army on precisely the same footing, and they tell you it is going to introduce some confusion; it is going to put one man up above five hundred others that are his seniors, and put another down, and create infinite confusion. Not so, Mr. President. It will introduce order—no, not order, for we never can get order until we get rid of this old legislation, but it is an approximation to it, and I hope the Senate will adhere to it, and that we shall not be choused out of it, if that is a proper expression, by the report of any committee of conference.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I was one of those who voted for this amendment on Saturday evening; and I did not vote for it in any haste or in ignorance of its operation, but because I conscientiously believed it would be an improvement upon our present Army discipline. There are two questions involved, or two questions upon which a reconsideration is predicated: one the service ration, the other the rank. If I remember correctly, the chairman of the Military Committee stated on Saturday evening that there was no distinction at the present time between the rank of volunteer officers and officers of the regular Army. It was, therefore, very properly contended that there could be no objection urged to this amendment on that ground. But it turns out, as was then believed, and as I believed myself, that there is a distinction, a distinction that is found in the Articles of War, which declare that wherever the two forces are serving together officers of the regular Army shall take precedence in rank, no matter what the dates of their commissions. On that subject I desire to say that I do not believe there is any merit in prescribing, by a sweeping regulation of that kind, a rank of this sort in the regular Army. Take the case which has been illustrated by the Senator from Massachusetts, a case in which the officer has seen twenty years' service, as he alleges, and is still a colonel, and the passage of this amendment will, it is said, put five hundred others above him. Does it not demonstrate that, by virtue of this Article of War, that man now outranks five hundred men who are probably his superiors in many respects? I say superiors for this reason: if he had been qualified, if he had been competent, would his name not have been included in the multitudinous lists which have been sent up here of brigadier generals and brevets? Has not the Department of War had every opportunity to advance that officer which could possibly be desired, by the conferring of brigadier generalships and by the conferring of brevet rank? Why, then, has he not been set forward? Why has he not been promoted if he stands in that attitude where this long service would entitle him to command all the volunteer officers of the different States? I say that the illustration which the Senator makes, on its face shows the inequality and the injustice of this mode of regulating the service.

I do not think it is desirable that these distinctions between the two armies should be kept up. I have never heard anybody defend them on the ground of reason; I have never heard anybody contend for them except upon the ground of regulation; and it is very clear that the circumstances which applied to a former state when the regular Army was almost our sole dependence, when volunteer troops were only called out for a temporary service of a few days, and which there gave rank, do not apply to the condition of a long war where men have been in the volunteer service long enough to fully and amply qualify themselves for the commands which they hold.

Now, sir, in regard to the other point, the service ration, I desire to call attention to the fact that it applies only to officers who are of the rank of colonel and under. It is not liable to the objection which has been presented by the Senator from Ohio. The regulation reads, "that every commissioned officer of the line or staff, exclusive of general officers, shall be entitled to receive one additional ration per day for every five years he may have served or shall serve in the Army of the United States."

I see no reason why, if that is to be applied to officers of the regular Army, it should not be applied equally to officers of the volunteer service. If there are officers of the volunteer service coming within the terms of this regulation, why should they not be entitled to it equally as officers of the regular Army? If they have served out their five years, why should they not have the ration just as well as any other officer who has served out his five years? In other words, what is the reason for predicated any such distinction against officers of the volunteer forces of the United States?

I think, therefore, that this amendment of the Senator from Illinois is a very good one. It removes the original amendment of the only objection to it, except the objection as to rank; and when we bear in mind the fact that was distinctly and explicitly declared here on Saturday evening, that there was no such ruling obtaining with the Department, but that they were on the same footing, that the regular Army officers did not outrank the volunteers, I do not see that gentlemen can now rise and object to it on that ground. I trust the amendment will prevail.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from New Hampshire has this morning made the same complaints against the Army that we are accustomed to hear him make against the Navy. He gets up here and arraigns the laws regulating the pay of Army officers, and says that they are unjust and not founded in reason. He says the officers ought all to be paid an equal amount of money. You might as well pay the traveling expenses of members of the Senate equally with just as must justice.

Mr. HALE. I have never said any such thing.

Mr. WILSON. Never said what?

Mr. HALE. Never said they ought all to be paid equally.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator said they ought to be paid a sum of money.

Mr. HALE. Yes, a gross sum of money.

Mr. WILSON. For what? For pay? Suppose we carry that out, and pay every captain and every lieutenant and every Army officer a gross sum, what would be the result? One officer is ordered to Baltimore, or Philadelphia, or New York, or some other place within a few miles of his residence, to perform duty, and another officer is ordered to Oregon or California; will it be just to pay them the same? The present law provides that officers shall be paid a certain amount for their traveling expenses. It is right, it is just, and every single one of these provisions is founded in equity and in justice. If we passed a law paying the officers all alike, it would be in the power of the Administration to order one officer to one place where he could live well on his salary, and lay up a little money, and to order another to another place where he would not get enough from the Government to pay his expenses, and thus force him out of the Army. In a large country like this with varied services, the present laws are an absolute necessity, and were not borrowed from England, but were passed by the Congress of the United States, and adapted to the varying changes of the Army service of this country.

Now, sir, it is proposed by this amendment to bring the volunteer officers up to, and not bring the regular officers down. There is more justice in that, but I do not see the necessity of any action in regard to the subject. Why is it necessary? These volunteer officers who have come into the Army will in a short time go out of it and return to civil life. The regular officers are in the Army as their profession for life.

The service ration was founded in reason. The Senator from Ohio tells us that there has been rapid promotion in the regular Army. I think if that Senator will examine the facts he will find that there has been no such rapid promotion as he supposes. He will find that many men who were captains ten years ago are now captains. He will find that there has been no such rapid promotion; but we have taken out of the regular Army and made general officers of volunteers quite a number of officers, but they get no service rations. The service ration is only allowed to colonels and officers under that rank.

I believe the whole effect of this measure will be to work an injury to the service. It can do no good whatever. I hope it will not be put upon this bill, at any rate. If the Senator means to press it, let him try to put it on some other military bill; but I suggest that this appropriation bill should be passed without it, and there will be some other bill before us in the course of this week to which it can be moved.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected, and the question recurring on the original amendment offered by Mr. TRUMBULL.

Mr. BROWN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. Is the question now on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois this morning?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment has been voted down, and the question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois which was before agreed to by the Senate, but has been reconsidered.

Mr. GRIMES. I had hoped that we could have a distinct question on the amendment offered this morning by the Senator from Illinois, and I move to reconsider the vote by which it was rejected.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. As I understand this amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, it does not change the law in any regard except that it provides that every volunteer officer who entered the service four years ago shall have a longevity ration when he has served long enough to entitle him to it; that is, an extra ration next year, after he shall have been in the service five years. I apprehend it does not change the rank of any officers in the regular Army or in the volunteer service; it does not take away any of the rations of the officers of the regular Army, but it simply gives to every volunteer officer after he has served five years an additional ration. I think he ought to have it, and therefore I want to vote in favor of this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. NESMITH. On this question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 37, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Henderson, Nye, Sherman, and Wilkinson—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Cowan, Harding, Howe, McDougall, and Saulsbury—6.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The question now recurs on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that this amendment is now limited merely to the question of rank; and I understand if it is adopted—and if I am wrong the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will correct me—that General Sherman (to take one illustration) will be placed behind forty-eight men who are now below him, and that General Thomas will be placed behind all the major generals below him who were commissioned between the date of his commission as major general of volunteers and the date of his commission as major general in the regular Army. I do not want, and I do not believe any Senator here wants, the first news General Sherman, who has shed such luster upon the American arms, shall hear when he has opened his communications with the North to be that we have put forty-eight over his head.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know where the idea comes from that the adoption of this amendment will put forty-eight men over the head of General Sherman.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can explain how it does it as I understand it. He was appointed a major general of volunteers. He ranks all those who were appointed major generals of volunteers after him. He is now appointed a major general in the regular Army. He has surrendered his commission as major general of volunteers. He takes the commission of major general in the regular Army, and is ranked by all the major generals whose commissions date older than his own, whether volunteers or regulars.

Mr. GRIMES. Now there is a very important inquiry to be answered by the Senator from Rhode Island: where is the law that gives to a junior regular officer of the Army control or jurisdiction or command over a senior officer in the volunteer service? If there is not any such law, this does not affect it; and I apprehend the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will inform the Senate that there is not any such law. I judge that the amendment which stands connected with the amendment that has just been adopted by the Senate amounts to just nothing at all. When we shall have adopted the amendment as amended, we shall have accomplished just one purpose, and that is, to give volunteer officers in the service a longevity ration; that is, one additional ration for every five years' service. The original amendment reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws, or regulations of the War Department, which give additional pay or rank to the officers of the regular Army over officers of the volunteer service of the same rank are hereby repealed.

The person who drafted this amendment went upon the assumption that there was some law which gave to a junior general officer in the regular Army command over a senior volunteer officer. There is not any such law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is such a regulation.

Mr. BROWN. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the act providing rules and regulations for the government of the Army; article ninety-eight:

"All officers serving by commission from the authority of any particular State shall on all detachments, court-martials, or other duty wherein they may be employed in conjunction with the regular forces of the United States, take rank next after all officers of like grade in said regular forces."

Mr. COLLAMER. General officers are not appointed by the States.

Mr. GRIMES. As my friend from Vermont says, that does not apply to any general officer, and does not apply to this case at all. Then, again, we passed a law a year or two ago, which authorizes the President to select any major general or any brigadier general, no matter what might be the date of his commission, and put him in command over those whose commissions were dated anterior to his own; so that it does not interfere with the public service. The only effect of the amendment, if adopted as it now stands, will be to give the longevity ration to volunteer officers in the service, and I think they are entitled to it.

Mr. CLARK. I find myself in this difficulty: I have not sufficient knowledge upon the subject before the Senate to act understandingly in regard to it, and I am not ashamed to stand here and confess it, because where the doctors seem to disagree the disciples should be free. If I vote for this amendment I may do mischief. I am told by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that I shall; that I shall vote for an amendment which will put some forty men over General Sherman's head, and I would as soon cut off my right hand as do that. The Senator from Illinois says it does not do it; the Senator from Massachusetts says it does do it; and I say I do not know. [Laughter.] I am not going to take a step in the dark, because I may go heels over head; if I stand still I can stand pretty safely; and therefore I am not going to vote for this amendment. I did vote for it on Saturday, and perhaps if I had information that it would not do any harm I should vote for it again; but I am not disposed to cast a vote by which I may do a great deal of harm, and perhaps do no good; and I, certainly, when these men have been fighting so gallantly for the country, will not diminish one iota of the rank and honor that belongs to them, be they regulars or be they volunteers. Praise and glory to them all, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I take it for granted that the chairman of the Military Committee can tell us what the effect of the amendment will be in the particular referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire. Certainly it must be very plainly one way or the other.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know that I can judge of what this provision means any better than any other member of the Senate. It repeals all laws that make any distinction between officers of the regular Army and officers of the volunteers. Take General Sherman's case. General Sherman is a major general in the regular Army of the United States; but it is stated that by this provision he will be outranked by forty-eight generals of volunteers. I do not know that I am any better judge of what the effect of the amendment will be than anybody else.

Mr. JOHNSON. If that is so, the chairman is certainly correct in the opinion he has given us as to the effect of this amendment. The amendment, if I recollect it aright, repeals all laws and all regulations making a distinction in rank between volunteer officers and officers of the regular Army.

Mr. GRIMES. What laws are they?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know. If there be any such laws, as I suppose there are, or the honorable member from Illinois would not have proposed to repeal them, it is very clear the result of this amendment will be that which is stated by the chairman of the Military Committee; and I take it for granted that, high as we may esteem volunteer officers, and great as have been their services to the country, we would not be willing that they should rank such an officer as Sherman. His progress recently has shed renown upon the country, and has now culminated in the capture of Charleston, information of which has just reached the President of the United States. It would place over him in command Major General Butler, and I do not mean to disparage him by stating it, and some twenty or thirty others whose commissions as major generals date at a period long antecedent to the date of Sherman's commission as a major general.

Then, in relation to the effect upon another grade of officers: the regulations of the War Department do not apply to general officers, as I understand; they apply to the subordinates—the majors, the captains, and lieutenants. Now, I suppose it will be generally accepted as true that the officers, in general, who have most distinguished themselves are those who have had a military education at West Point or at some other institution of that character. It is true in relation to our Army, it is true in relation to the army with which we have been fighting, that not one of them, or hardly any one of them, who has achieved a reputation of which a military man would be proud and for which his nation would be grateful, has not been educated at West Point; and, although I have as high an opinion of the volunteer officers as any member of this Senate, yet, all other things being equal, I am inclined to believe that a military education is calculated to make a man the better officer. But however that may be, I submit that as we stand now it would be exceedingly ill-advised legislation, legislation that the country would not approve, legislation which we ourselves, if the effect should be such as the honorable member from Massachusetts says it will be, would not approve. I submit, therefore, that however right it may be to give the service ration and to pay these volunteer officers just as much as the regular officers receive, it is just and proper and politic and due to their distinguished services in the field that the regular military officers should rank without reference to the date of commission.

Mr. ANTHONY. If this amendment is voted down, as I hope it will be, and the Senator from Illinois will then propose, as a distinct amendment, the amendment to the amendment which has just been adopted, giving the service ration to the volunteer officers, the Senate will undoubtedly accept it. As to the dispute about the effect which this amendment will produce on the relative rank of regular and volunteer officers, it is evident the question is not understood by the Senate. As the Senator from New Hampshire says, the doctors disagree. The War Department has no doubt on the subject. They believe that it will degrade General Sherman below forty-eight men who are now below him; and I am sure the Senate does not want to do that. It will have the same effect on General Thomas and a great many other officers. An amendment of this consequence should not be adopted without being referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and carefully considered by them. They can report to us precisely what the effect of it will be; and then if the effect will be as the Senator from Iowa says, we shall all vote for it; if the effect will be as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs says, we shall all vote against it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, it is very difficult, as the Senator from Maryland, who is a very astute lawyer, knows, to prove a negative; that a thing is not in the law; but if there is any law by which General Sherman is not outranked to-day by General Butler I would like the Senator from Maryland or the Senator from Massachusetts to show it. I would like to know where that law or regulation of the Department is, by which an officer in the regular service having a junior commission outranks one in the volunteer service having an older commission. Shall I be required to bring in the statutes here, and read them from beginning to end, and read the regulations of the War Department from beginning to end, to show that there is no such law, that there is no such regulation?

It appears by the ninth regulation of the War Department, which applies only to officers of the rank of colonel, and not to a general, and does not touch General Sherman, that where officers holding commissions of the same date, one from a State and one from the United States, the regular officer outranks the officer appointed by the State. I want to repeal that. I do not want the officer appointed by the President of the United States to command a colored regiment, if you please, to outrank the colonel appointed by the Governor of the State of New York, or the Governor of my State, simply because he gets his commission from the President of the United States, and the colonel in the other instance gets his commission from the Governor of New York or the Governor of Illinois. I know of no reason for this distinction in favor of the regular Army officer. If there is any law by which General Sherman is to be cut down forty-eight degrees, let us see it.

Sir, the name of General Sherman is brought in and used here, in consequence of the great distinction he has recently attained, for the purpose of keeping up this invidious distinction in the Army. Suppose we take the case of General Grant. He was a general in the volunteer service. He won his honors and his distinction in the volunteer service. He who led your armies to victory, (the first successful general who did lead your armies to victory,) and who is to-day at the head of all your armies, won the stars that adorn his shoulders in the volunteer service.

Mr. CARLILE. He was educated at West Point, though.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know he was educated at West Point; but this amendment does not relate to education at West Point. It merely puts the man in the volunteer service on an equality with the man in the regular service. It puts, or would have put, Lieutenant General Grant, when he was a general of volunteers, upon an equality with a general of the regular service having a commission of the same date. That is all it proposes to do, and he ought to occupy that position. I think the colonels in the volunteer service should rank according to the date of commission, and the fact that a man has a commission in the regular service, or from the President, should not put him above the colonel in the volunteer service who has a commission from a State.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I understood the Senator from Illinois to argue that there is no law authorizing a distinction in rank between the volunteer and regular officers. I will ask him whether there is not a regulation which confers such rank.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Only up to colonel practically.

Mr. MORRILL. Not beyond that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The regulation is:

"Officers serving by commission from any State of the Union take rank next after officers of the like grade by commission from the United States."

There are no officers serving by commission from any State of the Union, above the rank of colonel, as I understand.

Mr. MORRILL. Then, will the Senator allow me to ask him precisely what his amendment is aimed at?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment is aimed at that very thing. That is one of them.

Mr. MORRILL. Is that all?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, if there are any other distinctions made in the War Department in this complicated machinery of which the Senator from New Hampshire has spoken, I want to abolish them. I do not know but there are. It will do no harm to pass the amendment if there is no such distinction; but if there is any distinction made there by which superiority is given to a man in the regular service over one in the volunteer service of the same rank and date of commission I want it abolished, and I think it is time it was abolished.

I trust, therefore, that we are not to be driven from our propriety, and a just and proper amendment is not to be voted down in consequence of the eulogium of the Senator from Maryland upon the distinguished services of Major General Sherman. There is a law known to the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Massachusetts which authorizes the President of the United States to designate any major general to command an army, and places in subordination to him every other major general, whether of the regular or volunteer service, serving in that army, no matter what is the date of his commission. It is in virtue of that law that General Sherman leads the armies to-day that are accomplishing so much, and not in virtue of seniority of commission. It is because he has been designated, in consequence of his gallant deeds as commander of that army, and not because he holds an older commission than any other major general in it; so that, after all, General Sherman is not to be put down forty-eight degrees, nor are forty-eight major generals to be placed over him in consequence of this amendment. His name is used to frighten us from doing a just and proper act, from doing justice to the volunteer soldiery of the country who have won our battles.

Why, sir, what has become of your regular Army? I would like the Senator from Massachusetts to tell me. Has it got five thousand men in it? I doubt it.

Mr. WADE. Not one thousand.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not one thousand, the Senator from Ohio says. Then it is an army of officers, and that is all there is of it—merely to outrank the officers of the men who perform the service, and who are to put down this wicked rebellion; and officers having no men to command, who are to come in and command the volunteers, and command other officers of the same rank. Sir, can it be wrong to provide that these men who have no soldiers, and no regular Army left, when they come in among the volunteers, and are to command them, should take rank with the volunteer officers holding commissions of the same date?

Mr. RICHARDSON. A great deal has been said about placing officers of the volunteers over officers of the regular Army. That is not the effect of the amendment. The ninth article of the regulations is as follows:

"Officers serving by commission from any State of the Union take rank next after officers of like grade by commission from the United States."

Under this regulation a colonel appointed by the United States yesterday takes rank before a colonel of volunteers appointed by a State, who has been serving in the field for three years. The officers of the so-called regular Army now serving below the grade of colonel, with a few exceptions, are all appointed from civil life. We think it is wrong for an officer appointed by the President of the United States to command, if you please, a colored regiment, last week, to outrank an officer who has raised a regiment, carried it into the field, and performed service for three years. The law which makes him thus outrank that officer ought to be amended or repealed. If the proposition has any other effect about giving rank, all that is met by the law which we have passed authorizing the President of the United States to designate the officers with the grade of general who are to command. Under that law, the President of the United States can take a brigadier general and place him in command of his seniors in rank. I apprehend the only effect of this proposition is to do justice to the men serving with commissions from the States. Let them take their proper position upon courts-martial, and in command when they come in contact with those who have been appointed more recently by the President of the United States.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I shall vote for this amendment with great good will. It is a step in the right direction, a step in the direction of abolishing all distinctions between the volunteer and regular forces. Justice demands it, good policy demands it. In my opinion, Congress can do no act better calculated to benefit the public service than the passage of this amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 18, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Davis, Farwell, Foot, Grimes, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Richardson, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—18.

YAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doollittle, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Nye, Powell, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—24.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Cowan, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Saulsbury, and Sherman—8.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of May, 1865, the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates in the regular Army and volunteers and drafted forces in the service of the United States, shall receive twenty per cent. in addition to their pay now allowed by law.

I feel very well satisfied that the soldiers of the Army do not receive a sufficient compensation. The privates in the Army now get less than seven dollars per month, good money; and they have to support themselves and their families. That is entirely too small, and I think it ought to be increased. Heretofore, when we did increase their pay a little, I made an effort to have a proposition adopted that they should be paid in gold or its equivalent. If that proposition had been adopted, it would have given to the soldiers about the proper pay. It was voted down, however, by the Senate. As the Senate has refused to pay the soldiers in coin, or its equivalent if we could not get it, I desire now to raise their pay twenty per cent. Such is the depreciation of this paper money, and the great enhancement of the values of everything the families of these soldiers have to use, that the pay received by them is grossly inadequate. It is not my purpose to discuss the proposition. From the sympathy I have heard here about these poor soldiers whenever we attempt to add to the salary of anybody, I trust and believe it will pass by the unanimous vote of the Senate. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Kentucky bases his proposition upon the idea that the currency of the country is now so depreciated that in effect the wages of the officers and soldiers of the Army have been very much reduced. I must admit that the depreciation of paper has, as a matter of course, increased the prices of living, not only of soldiers and officers of the Army, but of everybody else; but, sir, that depreciation, instead of becoming greater, is, in my judgment, becoming less. I can state a fact in this connection. I had occasion during the month of August last to travel in Canada, to go to Montreal and Quebec, and for the purpose of paying expenses was compelled to purchase coin. The coin which I purchased as I left the United States to go into Canada cost me at the rate of $2 55 for $1. Since that time there has been a very great reduction in the price of gold, and the depreciation of the currency is becoming greatly less. A few days ago gold was being sold at 204. If the news which we received this morning be correct, and I have no reason to doubt it, that the enemy have evacuated Charleston—I understand the report to have come to the Department or the President, coming, it is true, from rebel newspapers—

Mr. JOHNSON. It was telegraphed to a Richmond paper, and was telegraphed by General Grant to the War Department.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As the Senator says, a telegram has been received at the War Department announcing that it is stated in a Richmond newspaper that Charleston is evacuated, as well as the capital of South Carolina. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor.) Order! Order!

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My opinion, Mr. President, is that this will reduce still more the price of gold, and should the time come to which I look forward with hope, that through the combination of our forces, the forces under Generals Sherman, and Schofield, and Foster, and Gillmore, and the forces under General Grant, we shall compel the evacuation of Richmond, the stronghold of the rebellion, gold will go down in its value, or rather our paper currency will go up in value in comparison with gold; and when it appears that we have captured the rebel capital, as I think we shall in the course of a few months, my belief is that the credit of the bonds of this Government will be such that we can command the gold and silver of the civilized world, and that gold will flow in upon us in exchange for our bonds and securities, and that the day of our resumption of specie payments may not be so distant as gentlemen suppose. I think it unwise in this state of affairs, with these victories on our hands, with these prospects just before us, for us to undertake by legislation to change the salaries of officers and soldiers in the Army, or of civil officers throughout the whole administration of the Government; for if you touch one class of these salaries you will be for the same reason compelled to change them all. Therefore I think it wiser for us to hold on and resist all these attempts, trusting to the good fortune which is smiling upon our cause in the reestablishment of the Union, and with it the credit of this Government upon a foundation that no power can shake either at home or abroad.

Mr. WILSON. Duty to the country compels me to oppose this ill-timed proposition. We owe to the armies more than one hundred and thirty million dollars. Hundreds of thousands of men have received no pay since the 31st of last August. Why is it that our armies are not paid? Why is it that their families at home are in thousands of cases suffering for the want of the money we cannot or have not paid? Our only excuse for this failure to pay our soldiers is our inability to procure the means to pay what we have already promised. The poverty of the Treasury is our only apology for this delay in paying our soldiers. Is it not better, far better, to pay the $130,000,000 now due our soldiers than to promise to pay more, and by so doing impair our credit and lessen our ability to pay what is already due? Let us, sir, let the Treasury Department provide the means to redeem the pledges already made to our soldiers before we make promises we cannot keep. The Government is, I am glad to know, making great efforts to pay our soldiers. Paymasters are now hastening to the armies to pay our soldiers. Let us not at this time by party action diminish our ability to complete this work of paying our long-suffering but patient soldiers. Nothing would give me more pleasure than to increase the pay of our soldiers. In 1861 I introduced the bill increasing their pay two dollars per month. At the last session I made the proposition to fix their pay at sixteen dollars per month. I would now increase their pay if I did not know that we would not redeem our pledges if we made them. This nation must put forth every effort to pay the amount already promised. Let the nation pay the soldiers promptly, and pay all its obligations at maturity, and thus increase the value of its currency, make the sixteen dollars now promised worth more than the twenty dollars proposed.

Most of our soldiers received large bounties on entering the service, in some cases they received nearly one thousand dollars in bounties. No armies in the world are so well paid as our armies. Let the Government pay promptly the amounts now pledged, and then it may be for the interests of the soldiers to increase their compensation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall vote to increase the pay of the soldiers. It is well known that I was no friend of this war in its inception; I have been no friend of it in its progress; but being in it, and the Government calling for the services of men, and they volunteering or being conscripted, I will vote to pay those men, who believe they are doing right, a reasonable compensation. I do not know that personally I am under any obligations to the soldiers so far as my State is concerned, because they have been taught to believe that my views are antagonistic to the cause in which they have been engaged to serve their country; but whatever deception may be practiced upon them, I intend in my capacity here as a legislator to vote that those men who believe they are serving their country faithfully shall receive a proper reward.

Sir, what is the compensation of a soldier? I understand it is the sum of sixteen dollars a month. Sixteen dollars a month to go upon the deadly battle-field! Sixteen dollars a month to leave wife, and children, and home, with all its endearments! Sir, it is no compensation at all; and although I believe that the war was a great mistake and that peace can never come to this country through the bloody track of war, I will vote to pay the men who think differently from me, guided by patriotic motives, a just and reasonable compensation.

Sir, I am glad to hear my honorable friend from Wisconsin say that very soon these troubles are to end, and that from the rapid progress which our armies are making victory is soon to perch, not only temporarily, but permanently and triumphantly upon our banners. I recollect that that honorable Senator some two years ago, in advance, invited us to dine in Richmond on the 4th of July. We were invited by him to dine there on the 4th of July, 1862. If the dinner was prepared it must have got cold before the guests arrived. Let me say to my honorable friend that if the policy which is now being pursued is to be continued, though Savannah falls, though Columbia falls, though Charleston falls, though Richmond falls, we dine not around the table of fraternal love and peace in his day or mine. The great mistake is being made at the present time of supposing that because points which are considered strong and important to the southern confederacy fall, that therefore this war is to close.

Why, sir, let me refresh the memories of Senators, because we live a thousand years in a day now, and the old expression of Scripture is fulfilled, "One day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." Take the results of the recent mission of the President of the United States and his Secretary of State, the peace conference as it was called, heralded in its advent with the announcement in the State organ that he went down in his "sovereign capacity to give terms to rebels." That was the first time in my life I ever heard such an expression applied to the Chief Magistrate of this country, that he was going down in his "sovereign capacity." He went. What did he say, according to the message which he himself delivered to the House of Representatives, but which he did not deliver to this body, although requested to do so? When you made a request of him for the proceedings in that conference, he referred you to the message which he had sent to the House of Representatives. Was such a thing ever heard of before in the Senate of the United States, that when a body which is considered to be the highest legislative council of the nation makes a particular request of the Executive that he shall make a certain communication, he refers them to something he had said to another important branch of the Government. But enough of that.

But, sir, what were the terms he offered? "We will hold no conference with you as a confederate power; we will not entertain your propositions."

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to a question of order. It is with a great deal of pain that I do so; but I insist that the Senator is not discussing the question before the Senate. It is painful to me to interpose this objection; but I have charge of this bill, and desire to pass it, and I respectfully submit the question to the Chair, and I hope that the honorable Senator, if the Chair shall agree with me, will conform to the rules of order. I am very anxious to progress with the public business, and therefore make this point of order, the first of the kind that I have ever made in the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If I am out of order no one will be more glad than myself to be informed of it, and to obey the rules. I know that the point of order is not made from any spirit of unkindness. I was reminding the Senate of the progress of the times, and I hope it has not come to this, that a Senator cannot discuss that question without points of order being raised. Sir, I have never violated the rules of your body, and I never expect to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order, under different circumstances, would be well taken; but after the debate has been proceeded in so long, and varied from the question before the Senate as it has from the beginning of the discussion for the most part of the time, the Chair would feel it ungracious to shut down a member on a motion of the kind before the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I assure the honorable member from Ohio, for whom, as he knows, I entertain the most profound respect, that I was not indulging in this strain of remark for the purpose of delay, or for the purpose of preventing him from consummating the business before the body. I was replying to the remark made by my friend from Wisconsin in reference to the early dawn of peace. I think that this delusion has gone far enough; that the sixty days' and the ninety days' ending of this war has had enough bad effect; and that Senators ought not to delude the people of this country with the idea that peace is dawning upon us. Sir, we have got years of bloody war to travel through before peace comes.

At the particular moment when I was interrupted by the honorable Senator I was stating why I thought that peace could not so soon return as my honorable friend suggested, and it was because the terms offered, as I learned them from an executive message communicated to the other House, but not to us, could not be expected to be complied with. Sir, I recollect reading in early life, and my memory has been somewhat refreshed from the reading of later years, that when the colonies protested against the exactions of the British Government that Government said: "You are rebels; we will not treat with you; lay down your arms, and we will treat with you." I recollect that in about two years after the commencement of that war George III, who was the "sovereign" of England and of the colonies, proposed to give to the colonies representation in Parliament and to relieve them of the onerous burden of taxation without representation if they would agree to it. That was all the colonies asked in the beginning. What was the answer? "The conflict has taken place; our fathers, and sons, and brothers have shed their blood; it is too late now to accept the terms that we would have accepted in the beginning." The British Government at first would not treat with rebels; but afterward another commission came to the colonies and offered to guaranty to them every right except that of separation. What was the reply? "The contest has progressed too far; there has been too much ill-feeling engendered, there has been too much blood spilt in this conflict to accept those terms; independence, and independence alone, are the only terms upon which we will agree to treat with you." Sir, without assuming to be a philosophical student of history I have watched the progress of this contest from the beginning, and history is now but repeating itself. The mad folly of the British Government lost to them the colonies; and if the mad policy that is now pursued is still continued it will, I fear, lose to the American Government a portion of the States that once belonged to it.

But the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance is impatient. The idea suggested opens up a vast field for debate, and the mind could range for hours in a comparison of the example of the revolutionary struggle and that afforded by this present contest. One word more and I have done, because I yield to what is the reasonable impatience of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. He wishes to get through the measures to support the Government, and I shall throw no obstacles in the way.

The reason that I sometimes utter these sentiments is this: I get into a friendly debate with some member of the opposition, and he is too polite to question my personal loyalty, but he tells me that the party to which I belong is not exactly loyal. Sir, I recollect that when hardly warm in my seat, when secession was broached in this Chamber, how it was, in a humble way and as an inexperienced youth (I had liked to have said) I raised my warning voice against it, and in private and in public protested against it; and to-day I find the great party that is now controlling the country taking to their embrace the very men who counseled it and giving to them the chief places in their political synagogue, while I and those who struggled against it are considered by them disloyal. Sir, I make no defense of my loyalty here or elsewhere; but this is my reason on all proper occasions for raising my voice on this subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At the last session I felt it my duty to offer as an amendment to the Army appropriation bill a proposition that the soldiers in the field should receive, in addition to the pay then allowed them, fifty per cent., which would give them about $19 50 per month. I thought, in view of the depreciation of the currency and of the expense of maintaining a family at home, that it was a very reasonable proposition. As the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky if adopted will achieve about that result, I shall very cordially give it my support. I think that we as a people are able to pay that, and I think as a matter of justice it ought to be given to them.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Harlan, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sautsbury, Wade, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cardie, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Cowan, Grimes, Harding, Richardson, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wiley—11.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now offer the amendment that was adopted a short time ago as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, to insert as a new section the following:

And be it further enacted, That officers in the volunteer service shall be entitled to the same rations as if they were in the regular service.

Mr. CONNESS. This is now simply proposed to increase the compensation of volunteer officers in such a manner as has been described as totally indefensible by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, by giving them what is called the service ration. The question of the increase of compensation of officers of the Army has been pretty seriously and patiently considered, and it is not necessary to say here that such increase has been given as the country can afford. I do not wish to discuss the Senator's amendment, but simply to say I cannot vote for it, for I regard it as an ill-judged increase at this time.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is the same amendment which the Senate just adopted almost unanimously to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, and then they rejected the amendment as amended, not on account of this proposition, but because they were opposed to the original proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to my friend from Rhode Island that the amendment is totally nugatory; that no volunteer officer will receive the benefit of it until after five years' service. It is therefore idle to put the amendment on this bill. It was offered as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, and was voted for by nearly every one who wanted to vote down the other amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. That is precisely what I was about to say. The very opposite of what the Senator from Rhode Island said is the fact.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to have an order made for the printing of Senate bill No. 449, making a grant of public lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of a railroad along the mineral range in said State. It has not been printed, although I think the order was made a few days ago when I presented the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to move that the Senate hold an executive session at half past seven o'clock this evening, for the purpose of acting solely on nominations.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suggest to the Senator to move to take a recess until half past seven o'clock, with a view to have an executive session. Several Senators. From what hour?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Say five o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. I will say from five o'clock till seven.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate take a recess from five o'clock until seven o'clock this evening, for the purpose of having an executive session at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Say half past four o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me ask my colleague, why confine the session this evening to executive business? It may be that it will be important then to go on with the business under consideration at the time the recess takes place.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be as the Senate may then determine.

Mr. SUMNER. I would rather that the order be general, that a recess be taken from half past four till seven o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. I will say in reply to my colleague that the Committee on Military Affairs authorized me this morning to make this motion, with a view of acting upon several hundred Army nominations that we now have before us, and which we are exceedingly anxious to dispose of.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Why not make it general?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, no; let us have it in the special form submitted by the chairman of the Military Committee. There is a great deal of executive business to transact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate take a recess from half past four o'clock till seven o'clock this evening, and that the Senate then proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not desire to discuss that motion, but I wish the Senator would say five o'clock. I have several Indian bills to be acted upon; and I do not want to trouble the Senate again with them, and I am afraid that will not give me time enough to finish them.

The motion of Mr. Wilson was agreed to.

REFUGEE INDIANS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 85, relating to the refugee Indians.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 307. It was understood, I believe, that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Nye] would have the floor to-day to make a speech on that bill, and I hope the Senate will afford him an opportunity to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 85) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certain bonds to the Secretary of the Interior for feeding the refugee Indians.

Mr. CLARK. Upon that motion I may as well say to the Senate what I designed to say when I rose and endeavored to get the floor a moment ago. I do not desire to interfere with the Senator's motion, but I wish to state to the Senate that there are on the Calendar perhaps twelve or fifteen private bills which it is necessary to act upon at some time and soon. I desire to avoid the struggle and the delay which often occur about the order of business, and I will ask the Senate to-morrow or the next day to let me have an hour of the Senate's consideration, if it can be done consistently with the public business, for the consideration of those bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 85) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certain bonds to the Secretary of the Interior for feeding the refugee Indians. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and deliver the bonds for the sum of $250,000, appropriated for the use of the Choctaw Indians by an act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1862, approved March 2, 1861, to the Secretary of the Interior, to be by him disposed of, and the proceeds thereof applied to the relief and support of individual members of Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Seminole, Wichita, and other affiliated tribes of Indians, who have been driven from their homes and reduced to want on account of their friendship to the Government, as contemplated by the provisions of an act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1863, approved July 5, 1862.

The Committee on Indian Affairs reported the resolution with amendments. The first amendment was in line four to strike out the words "to issue and deliver," and to insert the words "in lieu of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve, after the word "one" to insert the words "to pay," and after the word "Interior" to insert "$250,000;" so that the resolution will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in lieu of the bonds for the sum of $250,000, appropriated for the use of the Choctaw Indians by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1863," approved March 2, 1861, to pay to the Secretary of the Interior $250,000, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee also proposed to amend the resolution by inserting the following preamble:

Whereas the Choctaw tribe, a nation of Indians, have become allies of the rebels against the United States, and have been at war against them for more than three years, during which time the most cruel and barbarous acts were perpetrated upon the friendly Indians hereinafter mentioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish to say to the Senate, that they may understand precisely the nature of this resolution, that by the act of 1861 $500,000 was appropriated for the benefit of the Choctaw nation, $250,000 of which was paid down in cash and was received by them just about the time they went into this rebellion. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars was to be appropriated in bonds, to be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. In the subsequent legislation, in consequence of the rebellion of the Choctaw nation, we passed a bill by which we confiscated the annuities of the Choctaw nation for the benefit of the refugee Indians. It was claimed that under that law this $250,000 in bonds ought to have been passed over from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of the Interior, to enable him to feed these refugee Indians, but the Secretary of the Treasury declined to issue the bonds to the Secretary of the Interior. One reason why he declined to issue them was that it would put the Secretary of the Interior in a position to be selling bonds in competition with the Secretary of the Treasury. It was concluded by the committee, in recommending the amendment which they submitted to the resolution, that we should authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of these bonds which by the law ought to be issued for the benefit of the Choctaw nation, to pay over the money to the Secretary of the Interior.

This appropriation is necessary; and I will state also to the Senate that on the appropriation bill, or some other bill, a further appropriation may be asked for in relation to these refugee Indians. It is understood, I suppose, by the Senate that about twenty thousand of them were driven out by the rebel Indians, with the assistance of some rebels who joined them. The Choctaws and Chickasaws drove out the Creeks and Cherokees, and they came, in the midst of suffering untold and indescribable, into the State of Kansas, where they were fed and kept for a while, and then by a law of Congress they were ordered to be sent back. They have been sent back, and it is absolutely necessary that these funds should be used for their support.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, the title was amended so as to read: A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Secretary of the Interior $250,000, in lieu of certain bonds, for feeding certain refugee Indians.

INDIAN AFFAIRS IN CALIFORNIA.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 370) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better organization of Indian affairs in California."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not think it is necessary to read the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment is proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the form of a substitute for the entire bill, and unless some member shall call for the reading of the original bill the substitute only will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the original bill, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Interior to pay the settlers in Hoopa valley, California, for their improvements on the Indian reservation therein: Provided, That before the same or any part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid, the said improvements shall be appraised by the superintendent of Indian affairs, the Indian agent at said reservation, and the surveyor general of California; and if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, their appraisement shall be reasonable, and shall not in the aggregate exceed the sum herein appropriated, the said Secretary is hereby authorized to apply the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in payment for the said improvements, taking proper releases therefor: And provided further, That the moneys hereby appropriated be reimbursed from the proceeds of the sales of Indian reservations in said State, under the provisions of the act to provide for the better organizations of Indian affairs in California, approved April 8, 1864.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ought, perhaps, to explain to the Senate the nature of this amendment. In the act "to provide for the better organization of Indian affairs in California" there was a provision which authorized the Secretary of the Interior to take steps toward the appraisement of the value of the improvements and settlements made by certain persons upon certain reservations for the Indians. There was a general provision in it, however, that no contract made by him should be valid, "nor any money paid thereon until upon a report of said contract and of said valuation" should be made "to Congress," and the same approved, "and the money appropriated by law for that purpose." The proposition is here to so far modify the effect of this provision as to one of the reservations, to wit, the Hoopa valley reservation, to make it an exception, and to authorize to a certain extent, to the amount of $60,000, the money to be appropriated if it be necessary by the Secretary of the Interior upon the appraisement of the surveyor general, the superintendent of Indian affairs, and the Indian agent. All three of these gentlemen are, I believe, men of high character and standing in California. At all events, such is my information from the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS.] Perhaps I should state to the Senate that in the neighborhood of this Hoopa valley an Indian war has been going on for several years; almost a regiment of our troops has been kept there fighting these Indians; and at last they have come to terms and are willing to keep the peace provided they can go at once into this valley. For this reason there becomes a necessity for action, and the Committee have thought proper to recommend the appropriation.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," insisted on its non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate to the bill, asked a further conference thereon, and had appointed Mr. R. C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. T. E. WOODBRIDGE of Vermont, and Mr. J. GANSON of New York, managers at the conference on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

A bill (S. No. 385) authorizing the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War; and

A bill (S. No. 402) to repeal an act entitled "An act to remove the United States arsenal from the city of St. Louis and to provide for the sale of the lands on which the same is located."

INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN WASHINGTON.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, the bill (H. R. No. 624) to provide for the payment of the value of certain lands and improvements of private citizens appropriated by the United States for Indian reservations in the Territory of Washington was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $18,611 62, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of paying for the lands and improvements of private citizens taken and appropriated by order of the Department of the Interior for Indian reservations and uses in the Territory of Washington; and the claims thus provided for are to be allowed and paid in such manner and upon such proofs of the value of the property as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS OF MICHIGAN.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians residing in Michigan the sum of $192,850, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution as passed by the House of Representatives proposed to direct the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians residing in Michigan, the sum of $192,850, being the amount of annuities and moneys erroneously paid to the main tribes of Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians, of Pottawatomie nation of Indians, which belonged to the portions of those tribes residing in the State of Michigan; the payment to be made out of any moneys or stocks now in the possession or under the control of the United States Government belonging to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians, or Pottawatomie nation of Indians.

The joint resolution had been reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, the first of which was to strike out "$192,850," and insert "$50,927 50," in five equal annual payments of $10,185 50 each, to be paid to them pro rata, severally, in the State of Michigan, by the Indian agent appointed for that State.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Upon this amendment perhaps I can just as well explain as at any other stage what this joint resolution is, and what is its effect. It does not affect the United States or the Treasury of the United States, but it is a settlement of claims between different portions of the same original tribe of Indians. This tribe of Indians in 1833 made a treaty at Chicago in which they sold all their lands west of Lake Michigan and south of Lake Michigan, and in consideration of the sale took five million acres west of the Mississippi, and also some annuities which were provided for in that treaty, and there were with this Indian tribe several other treaties existing before that time.

When the treaty of 1833 came to be signed so as to be binding on the tribe, there was a portion of the bands residing in Michigan who were unwilling to sign the treaty because they were unwilling to remove from Michigan and go with the Indians west of the Mississippi, and they put their objection on the ground of their religious creed. They were Catholics, and they desired not to go with the other members of the tribe, but to remain in Michigan; and there was an additional stipulation made the next day after the signing of the treaty by which it was agreed that they might remove to the northern part of the State of Michigan to a place called l'Arbre Croché or Crooked Tree, where it was expected that they would mingle with a small band of Catholic Indians, and there, if they removed to that place, they might be permitted to receive their share of the annuities paid under all former treaties, and under the treaty for the sale of their own reservations in Michigan. These Indians went to l'Arbre Croché, but for some reason did not remain there. Either they did not like the country, or for some other reason, they came back, and with some money that had been paid to Pokagon, one of the chiefs, they purchased some land near a lake in Michigan called Pokagon lake, and they settled there on lands which were purchased from the United States, and have remained there ever since.

After some years had elapsed, application was made to Mr. Crawford, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, through the superintendent at Detroit, Mr. Stuart, to make some allowance to these Indians, and he made an allowance in which he assumed to give them a share of the money annuities, and nothing else; but when he figured up the amount of those annuities he made the mistake of omitting several of the treaties which were then in existence, and under which the Indians that remained in Michigan had just as much right to receive their share as they had under the treaties under which he did give them a share of the annuities.

The committee of the House of Representatives in looking to this matter thought proper to allow to these Indians in Michigan not only their share of the money annuities, but their share of the proceeds of the five million acres west of the Mississippi, and also a share in the school fund, and in the mill fund, which was set apart for the benefit of the tribe in its new home west of the Mississippi. The committee of the Senate thought this was unjust to the Indians west of the Mississippi. These Indians in Michigan have remained there unaffected; they have had the benefit of the commercial advantages of Michigan, the mills of Michigan, the agriculture of Michigan, the schools of Michigan, and many of them are citizens of Michigan, and are very respectable farmers, as I am told, in the State of Michigan. The committee of the Senate, therefore, propose to reduce the appropriation from $192,000 to fifty thousand and odd dollars, confining the Indians in Michigan to their share of the money annuities, insisting on our part that they, by choosing to remain in Michigan, so far detached themselves from the fortunes and the destiny of the main tribe that they had no right to share in the lands, or the school fund, or the mill fund which were to establish the tribe in their new home west of the Mississippi. That was substantially the ground on which we made our report.

We propose to make the payment in five annual installments, because we cannot pay it all in one year out of the funds of the Indians' west; or if we should do so the effect would be to leave them without anything to support themselves. So we propose to deduct from their annuities one fifth each year of this amount for the purpose of paying the Indians in Michigan. I think the committee are right.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Since this joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs there has been an argument submitted to the Senate in behalf of the Kansas Indians, showing conclusively, in my opinion, that there is but a very small amount of money, two or three thousand dollars, due from the Kansas Indians to the Michigan Indians. That this argument and the facts in support of this position may be investigated by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that a delegation that is now here from the Kansas Indians may have an opportunity of being heard, I move that the joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope this reference will not be made. I hope the Senate will proceed with the final consideration of this resolution for the relief of the Michigan Indians. It has been pending before the appropriate committee of this body for nearly a year, and I am quite satisfied from the attention I have been able to give the subject that that committee, certainly with every desire to do justice to the Indians in my State, have in their report which is now before us fallen a good deal short of that justice which would be rendered to the Michigan Indians if they could prosecute the claim in a court of equity. Still I am not disposed to have any controversy with the committee in regard to the amount which they have reported, and I shall support the amendment which has come from the committee.

I did not understand the honorable Senator from Kansas when he made a remark that some recent evidence had been discovered. There was some confusion in the Hall at that moment. I should like to understand from him what that newly-discovered evidence is to show that the amount proposed to be allowed is so vastly exorbitant. I would thank him to restate his proposition.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Kansas Indians have been unrepresented during the present session while this question has been pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOWARD. It was the new evidence that I was anxious to hear about.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am about to state that—

Mr. HOWARD. I did not ask for a new speech.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am not in the habit of inflicting on the Senate new speeches or very long ones. I was about to state that since this report was submitted to the Senate by the Committee on Indian Affairs, an attorney acting for the Kansas Indians has presented and laid upon the desks of Senators an argument and facts that conclusively show to my mind that the amount reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs is a great deal larger than is due from the Kansas to the Michigan Indians. It shows that there are but some three or four thousand dollars due from the Kansas Indians to the Michigan Indians instead of fifty or fifty-one thousand, as reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOWARD. I take it for granted that the Indian Bureau, who have given this subject their minute and careful attention, have discovered all the payments that have been made to the Michigan Indians, and that they understand as well as any person can understand what is justly due to them. The joint resolution, as it came from the House of Representatives, appropriating $192,000, was, I believe, founded upon a report or statement emanating from the Indian Bureau. The Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate have seen fit to cut that amount down to $50,000, for reasons satisfactory doubtless to their own minds. I do not find any fault with that, but I must presume also that the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate have had as ample opportunities to ascertain all the facts of the case as my honorable friend from Kansas has. If he has had any new revelations on the subject recently, or within the last week or ten days, why has he not made a motion to recommit this resolution to the same committee for the very purpose of having a reinvestigation? And still I believe he has not made any such motion. Of course I do not intend to controvert his statement that he has discovered evidence which is satisfactory to his mind—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator from Michigan allow me to say a word?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This resolution was passed by the House of Representatives in March last, almost a year ago, and the Committee on Indian Affairs have had both written and printed arguments on both sides of the question by men assuming to act as agents or attorneys for both the Michigan Indians and the Kansas Indians.

Mr. HOWARD. So I supposed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Clark has presented his argument in favor of the Michigan claim, and Mr. Brackinridge has presented his argument both in written and printed form against the claim, in behalf of the Kansas Indians. It is a question that the Committee on Indian Affairs have carefully considered. I have sometimes thought that the questions sent to that committee are the most troublesome of all the questions that come before the Senate. Each case always stands by itself, and we have to do the best we can. Here the Michigan Indians, on the one hand, claimed $192,000, and the Kansas Indians, on the other hand, alleged that there was nothing due. We have looked the matter over and arrived at the best possible result we could; and we think the resolution as it stands, with the amendments we propose, had better be passed by the Senate now, and not be recommitted.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether the statement I made that an argument on behalf of the Kansas Indians has been printed and laid on the desk of Senators since this report was made by the committee, is not true.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe it is true, and I suppose Senators have probably read that argument.

Mr. HOWARD. I can only say for myself that I have given to this subject my best attention; I have ransacked all the treaties which are involved in the question, and have read as carefully as I was able to do all the reports of a date anterior to the present time, and I am entirely satisfied that the Michigan Indians are really entitled to a very large allowance out of the annuities which have been paid heretofore to the Kansas Indians. As I said before, I think the amount embraced in the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs is not quite sufficient, but I shall not find fault with that. That there is a large amount due to the Michigan Indians is as certain to my mind as any fact can be. I hope, therefore, the subject will not be recommitted.

Mr. HARLAN. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas whether it would not be well for him to withdraw this motion, and allow the vote to be taken on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that being disposed of I shall be enabled to offer an amendment which I hope will meet his approbation. If the Senate shall not adopt the amendment that I intend to propose, I will then vote with him for a recommitment. I may state too, while I am on the floor, that I do not agree with the majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs in their report, nor with the statement made by the Senator from Michigan. I do not think there is a dollar due these Indians of Michigan under the treaty.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Senator from Michigan is largely in error when he says that the joint resolution as it came from the House of Representatives was predicated upon the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The fact is that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs reported a basis of settlement making the amount due less than $100,000, about $90,000 I think, while the House resolution proposed to take from the Kansas Indians $192,000.

I withdraw the motion to recommit for the present, on the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, so as to let the vote be taken on the amendment of the committee, with the understanding that the Senator from Iowa shall propose his amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the committee. Is that what he intends?

Mr. HARLAN. I propose, after the amendments of the committee shall have been acted on, to offer an amendment striking out all that will have been inserted, and inserting what I shall then send to the Chair.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Why not offer the amendment as a substitute for the pending amendment?

Mr. HARLAN. That would not be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The motion to recommit is withdrawn, and the question recurs on agreeing to the first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the word "equitably" before "belonged" in line fourteen. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "such payment to be made" in line sixteen.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out in lines sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen the words "stocks now in the possession or under the control of the United States Government belonging," and to insert in lieu of them "annually payable."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended reads as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and required to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians, residing in Michigan, the sum of $50,927 50, in five equal annual payments of $10,185 50 each, to be paid to them pro rata, severally, in the State of Michigan, by the Indian agent appointed for that State, being the amount of annuities and moneys erroneously paid to the main tribes of said Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians, (or Pottawatomie nation of Indians,) which equitably belonged to the portions of said tribes residing in the State of Michigan, out of any moneys or annuities annually payable to the said Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians, or Pottawatomie nation of Indians.

Mr. HARLAN. I now propose to amend the joint resolution by striking out all after the word "required" in the fourth line to the end and inserting the following:

To place the names of the Chippewa, the Ottawa, and the Pottawatomie Indians residing in the State of Michigan, on the pay rolls of the Pottawatomie nation of Indians, and from and after the passage of this resolution to pay annually to each of said Indians residing in the State of Michigan his or her full and equitable proportion of all annuities payable in money to said Pottawatomie nation of Indians under any law of the United States, or by virtue of any treaty made between the United States and the said Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians, or any of them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The effect of that amendment, as I understand it, would be not to pay the Michigan Indians for the annuities which they ought to have received under the construction we give to the treaty, but to authorize them from this time forward to take their share of those annuities and also their share of the proceeds of the lands west.

Mr. HARLAN. So far as they are payable in money to the members of the tribe.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think that the provision reported by the committee is the best, all things considered. I differ from my friend from Iowa. He stated a short time since that he did not think there was anything due to these Indians, and I understand the ground on which he rests that opinion to be that technically these Indians in Michigan did not comply with that provision of the treaty which required them to remove to l'Arbre Croche, in the northern part of the peninsula. The facts upon that subject are such that you may say that technically they did not comply with that provision of the treaty; but the majority of the committee were of opinion that inasmuch as these Indians were permitted to remain in Michigan, to purchase and take the title of lands from the United States, and to reside there in Michigan all this time without any objection on the part of the United States, or any attempt to compel their removal, there was a substantial waiver of this requirement of their removing to the northern part of the peninsula of Michigan; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in a letter which he wrote to Mr. Stuart takes that ground substantially. In his letter is contained the precise language of that treaty provision:

"And as since the signing of the treaty a part of the band residing on the reservations in the Territory of Michigan have requested, on account of their religious creed, permission to remove to the northern part of the peninsula of Michigan, it is agreed that, in case of such removal, the just proportion of all annuities payable to them under former treaties, and that arising from the sale of the reservation on which they now reside, shall be paid them at l'Arbre Croche."

After quoting this article, the Commissioner goes on to say:

"By the tenor of this article it would seem that their claim is well founded, and that they are entitled to their numerical proportion of those annuities payable to the tribe under the treaty of 1829, and also under the supplementary article of the treaty of 1833, amounting together to $18,000."

The language of the provision is their "just proportion of all annuities payable to them under former treaties." He by mistake in looking into these treaties only saw one, the treaty of 1829, when in fact there were various treaties existing. There was the treaty of 1800; the treaty of 1793, giving them $1,000 forever annually; the treaty of 1809, giving them $500; the treaty of 1818, giving them $2,500; that of 1828, $2,000; that of 1829, $1,600; and there were also treaties with limited annuities, some having five, eight, twelve, sixteen, and eighteen years to run; there were the treaties of 1821, 1826, 1828, three in 1832, and one in 1833, besides the one which he included. Although the Commissioner admitted the justness of the principle upon which they claimed their share to the proportion of the annuities, he did not raise the question with these Indians and say to them, "You did not remove out of Michigan." He did not say "You have not complied with the treaties on your part." The Indians did in fact, or a considerable portion of them, go up to l'Arbre Croche, but came back, and, as I stated some time since, purchased lands from the United States—Pokagon did purchase lands of the United States and take a title in fee simple by patent like other purchasers—and have ever since lived on these lands, remaining in Michigan.

The difference between my friend from Iowa and myself on that subject is that he thinks they have not complied with the treaty by removing to the northern part of Michigan, and therefore technically they have no claim to any part of this money; but I think there has been a substantial waiver on the part of the Government of the strict fulfillment of the letter of the treaty which required them to go to l'Arbre Croche, and that, therefore, in justice we ought to allow them their share of money annuities, but not give them a share of the proceeds of the five million acres, or of the agricultural fund, or the mill fund west.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I have no doubt that my friend, the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] intended to state my views correctly. I prefer, however, to state them myself. In the first place, these Indians, if they were to remove at this time west, and unite with their tribe, as was originally intended, would at once be reinstated to all their rights as members of the tribe. That they are not now receiving the full amount of money which would be due to any equal number of Indians of that tribe is their own fault. If they were to remove west, and unite with their brethren, they would at once be reinstated, and enjoy all the rights as members of the tribe.

To understand this subject it is necessary to consider a number of treaties, some of them made with separate bands or smaller tribes of what is now called the Pottawatomie nation of Indians, perhaps ten or a dozen in all, extending over a long period of time. The last treaty on this subject was ratified in 1836. By virtue of these treaties it was made obligatory on the Indians to remove to their new homes west of the Missouri river. In a supplemental article, however, it was stipulated that a band of Indians supposed to include some of these claimants might receive their proportion of the annuities in the north of Michigan. If, therefore, they had moved west of the Missouri river they would have received their proportion of the annuities and also of lands at their new homes; and if they declined to move west, and removed to the north of Michigan, they would have received their proportion of annuities, but no lands. These Indians did neither. It is not claimed that they went west. But it is alleged that they did go north. The testimony, however, does not satisfy me that they did thus remove. It is true that some of them went up to the upper end of the peninsula about the period when a payment was to be made, and immediately after the payment returned to their former homes. They never made a substantial compliance with the provision of the treaty, never attempted to settle and live at the new place indicated in the supplemental article of the treaty allowing them to share in the annuities payable to members of this tribe if they did not move west of the Missouri river. Then, as I think, they have no right to claim anything under the treaty.

In the next place I inquire, is it politic to disregard this condition of the treaty? What was the object of the Federal Government in making a treaty with these Indians? There were doubtless two objects: one was to procure lands for white settlers; another was to improve the condition of the Indians, to place them in such situation that they might avail themselves of the advantages of instruction in the arts of civilized society. These Indians, in refusing to go west, came in direct conflict with the policy of the Government; and if we depart from this condition in this case the effect will be, so far as Indians are supposed to take notice of the policy of the Government, and to be influenced by it, to encourage all other Indians that may make treaties with the United States to refuse to comply with this essential and vital part of their contract; it will encourage them to adhere to their old homes, to refuse to give up the land ceded to the Federal Government, and to refuse to go to the new reservations indicated in their treaties, thus overturning the settled policy of the Government, rendering it powerless in the future to execute Indian treaties.

But in the next place, it is proper that the Senate should observe before voting on this proposition that these are not the only Indians that rightfully belong to this tribe who have refused to comply with this feature of their treaty obligations. There are several hundreds of them living in the State of Wisconsin receiving no annuities. There are hundreds more of them that are vagrants scattered about in the Territories, some of whom have united with other bands of Indians, and ignored their rights as members of this particular tribe, and are for the time being receiving pay, clothing, and food as members of other tribes, some of them perhaps an amount equal to what they would receive as members of this tribe, and others of them much less. If we pass this bill diverting a portion of the annuities from the main tribe, and paying them to the Indians in Michigan, next year we may and probably will be called upon to make a similar diversion in favor of the Indians in Wisconsin. Neither of these bands of Indians has complied with the provisions of the treaty. If you waive this condition in favor of the Michigan Indians, can you decline it when demanded by their brethren in Wisconsin or elsewhere? This claim and all such originate with claim agents who are hanging about the capital, and embracing every available opportunity to prey on the Treasury or on claimants who are so unfortunate as to fall into their hands. They learn of some pretext for a claim, then contract with the Indians for fifteen or twenty or fifty per cent. of all that may be recovered, and then bring to bear all the arts and appliances known to this profession. Success in one case stimulates efforts in others. Grant the demand in this case, and you will be overwhelmed with similar demands. It will open a vast field for enterprising claim agents. Hundreds of vagrant bands of Indians have equal claims for consideration. This is the initiatory case.

The Federal Government has never heretofore waived a condition of a treaty requiring the Indians to remove in a solitary instance. In this case these Indians were permitted the option of going west or north under the treaty and supplemental treaty; they might go west with the main tribe, settle with them, and enjoy all the privileges of members of the tribe, or they might go north and settle with Indians who were then living in that part of Michigan, and if they went north they were to receive their just proportion of all annuities, but no lands. These Indians did neither; they neither went west, nor did they move north, and unite with the Indian tribes living in that vicinity.

Then having complied with neither of these provisions, having forfeited their rights under the treaties, they come in here by an attorney and demand that the Federal Government shall go back to the year 1836, twenty-nine years, and ascertain the aggregate of all annual payments to which they would have been entitled if they had complied with the provisions of the treaty. In nearly all civilized communities there are statutes of limitation that bar debts overdue for a specified period; but here are a poor, defenseless tribe of Indians for whom this Government is guardian, who have complied with all their treaty stipulations, and have received from the Government from year to year the annuities due them from the Government. They have received this money from year to year for a period of nearly thirty years, when a fragmentary band of their brethren who never did comply with their treaty obligations demand that the law-abiding portion shall disgorge in their favor. Nothing could be more unjust, and nothing could be more clearly in conflict with the settled policy of the Government as well as in conflict with the usages of civilized communities in relation to the payment of old debts. Six or eight years would bar such a supposed debt between members of civilized society; but here the claim being made by civilized Indians, aided by astute attorneys, against savages, you are asked to ignore this principle in a case nearly thirty years old.

It is said by the chairman of the committee that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in the year 1843, did direct that a portion of these annuities should be paid to these Michigan Indians. That is true, but there is no evidence justifying the conclusion that this was the result of careful investigation. It was recommended by the superintendent of Indian affairs in the Northwest, then living at Detroit, I believe, that some provision should be made for these Indians in Michigan. I doubt not that an appeal was made to the humanity of that superintendent. They were probably destitute of food and raiment, and it became necessary to make some provision for them, and he recommended to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at Washington city that something should be allowed them; and under that state of facts, on that suggestion of the superintendent, without any investigation, as far as the committee knows, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs did order that a certain sum should be paid annually, of about fifteen hundred dollars, I think, and that has been regularly paid from that time to the present. This, it may be claimed, was a waiver on the part of the Federal Government; but it only can be maintained to be a waiver to the extent that it was waived, and that was to the amount of $1,500 a year, and to commence in 1843. This bill, however, proposes to overturn this decision and to go back seven years to 1836, and to enlarge the amount from the whole period intermediate between 1836 to the present, and thence to the end of time.

The amendment that I propose will not unsettle what the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has done, but will increase the amount from the date of the passage of this bill, by putting these Indians, now residing in Michigan, on an equal footing with their brethren residing in Kansas so far as annual payments in money are concerned; and this is all which in my judgment they have a right to expect. They have not a right to claim that we shall now make a waiver of the conditions of their treaties, which will reach back thirty years and give them what they would have been entitled to if they had complied with their part of the contract.

I confess that there is another consideration that weighs on my mind somewhat, and that is that I do not doubt that a large part of this money will not inure to the benefit of these Indians. The claim has been fished up by attorneys and claim agents, who, it is said, and as I believe, have contracts with these Indians for fees that will absorb a very large part of the amount proposed to be paid. I do not propose by any vote of mine to encourage any such profession. From the facts that come to my knowledge, I think the agents for the Indians in Kansas and the agents for the Indians in Michigan have combined their interests, and are all now in favor of this measure. I think they have entered into a contract to divide the spoils between themselves; and hence, if the resolution should be recommitted I do not think there will be any just representation of the Kansas Indians.

I propose to treat these Indians as we have been treating all the Indian tribes under the control of the Federal Government from the beginning, to require them to comply with the conditions of their treaties; but if we make a waiver, to let that waiver affect them from the date at which it is made and to the extent to which it is made. These Indians are civilized to some extent, and perhaps will be as well off or better off remaining in Michigan than they would be in Kansas. I am willing to allow them from this time forward to draw their full proportion of all payments now being made in money to this tribe, but I cannot go further than this.

I ought, I think, to suggest that perhaps this measure is of doubtful policy. These are civilized Indians, and on that account their presence with the tribe would be advantageous to the wilder members of the tribe, and hence the Federal Government has an interest in requiring these civilized Indians to go and live with their brethren.

Mr. RAMSEY. Perhaps they will turn savages if you send them out there.

Mr. HARLAN. Some men think so, but I do not. I believe the influences of civilized communities are stronger than those of savage communities; I believe that Christianity is stronger in its influences than paganism; and that civilized Indians living with other Indians would at least have a strong tendency to correct their evil passions and habits, and tend to qualify them for the enjoyments of civilized society. We have, in fact, a direct interest in requiring these civilized and Christian Indians to go and live with their brethren; but if it is thought best not to insist on this condition now I am willing to place them now in the same attitude that they would have occupied if they had gone west, as to the division of annuities hereafter to be paid. I cannot go further than this.

Mr. HOWARD. I confess, sir, after hearing the Senator from Iowa denounce in such bitter language this claim and the agents connected with it, that I entertain some fears that in venturing to speak a word in behalf of the Indians of Michigan I too may attract his criticism and his personal reflections; but, sir, I must endeavor to do my duty in this regard at whatever hazard, whatever consequences.

The question, Mr. President, before the Senate is not how many agents are connected with this claim, or what may be their character; not whether the Michigan Indians have sent here A, B, or C to prosecute their claim before Congress, or what the character of those agents may be. The question we are to pass upon is the justice or injustice of the claim itself; whether it be supported by principles of law and by treaties with the Indian tribes and with these Michigan Indians, or whether there be no law and no treaty for the claim to stand upon.

Now, sir, let me say to the honorable Senator from Iowa, for whom I entertain a great respect, that in reading the two treaties of September 26 and 27, 1833, made at Chicago, he seems entirely to have misapprehended their force and effect. He speaks of the removal of these Indians as being one of the conditions of the treaty. Sir, that is entirely a misapprehension, as I will show in a moment. What was the state of facts in regard to these several tribes of Indians known commonly as the United nation? In 1833 the Pottawatomies, Chippewas, and other tribes, now and then consolidated under the title of the United nation, owned a very considerable tract of land in Michigan in the shape of reservations; they owned a very large tract of land in the State of Illinois; and on the 26th of September of that year a treaty was entered into between these Indian tribes and the United States by which the Indians ceded to the United States some five million acres of land lying in the State of Illinois. In this cession of land not only those Indians who are now called Kansas Indians, who have gone off and now reside in Kansas, but also the Michigan Indians, were interested as owners and occupants. For this cession of land in Illinois by these several tribes of Indians the Government stipulated to pay Indian tribes as a united nation certain annuities to a very considerable amount; and in addition thereto set apart and assigned to them a tract of land of about five million acres, if I remember rightly, west of the Mississippi river, lying in the State of Missouri. Such was the bargain, such the quid pro quo. The Indians sold their lands in Illinois and their reservations in Michigan for these annuities and for the land lying west of the Mississippi river. The Michigan Indians were parties to this contract, because they were part and parcel of the United nation; they were part of the Indian owners of the soil; they sold the interest they held in the lands in common with the other Indian occupants; and none of them entered into any agreement by which they were to remove west of the Mississippi or elsewhere. The idea that their grant was made on the condition that they should remove out of Illinois is wholly a misapprehension. The language of the treaty is this—I refer to the treaty of 26th of September, 1833:

"And as it is the wish of the Government of the United States that the said nation of Indians should remove to the country thus assigned to them as soon as conveniently can be done, and it is deemed advisable on the part of their chiefs and head men that a deputation should visit the said country west of the Mississippi and thus be assured that full justice has been done, it is hereby stipulated that the United States will defray the expenses of such deputation."

It was left optional with the Indians themselves whether they would go west and occupy that land or whether they would go somewhere else. They entered into no stipulation, no covenant to remove to the west. They were as free to go to the east as to the west. They do not say they agree to go, but the treaty says "it is the wish of the Government of the United States" that they shall remove, not that they shall remove absolutely. It so happened that a large portion of the Indians residing in Michigan were Christian Indians; the most of them belonged to societies or churches that had been established in the remote wilderness of Canada and the Northwest for a hundred years. They were the disciples of the Jesuit missionaries, the first Christian missionaries who visited those remote regions; they were attached to their Catholic teachers; to the Catholic church; and they felt a natural reluctance to emigrate and leave their old homes, the graves of their fathers and the altars at which they and their ancestors had worshipped for so many generations, and seek their fortunes in the wild woods west of the Mississippi; and in order to relieve them the Commissioner and the Indians on the very next day, the 27th of September, entered into a supplemental treaty in which a specific provision is made for the Indians of Michigan in the following words:

"And as since the signing of the treaty"—

That is, the treaty of the 26th of September, the day previous—

"And as since the signing of the treaty a part of the band residing on the reservations in the Territory of Michigan have requested, on account of their religious creed, permission to remove to the northern part of the peninsula of Michigan, it is agreed that, in case of such removal, the just proportion of all annuities payable to them under former treaties, and that arising from the sale of the reservation on which they now reside, shall be paid them at l'Arbre Croche."

Such is one of the clauses in the supplemental treaty, provisional in its nature, but in no sense imperative upon the Indians. It simply gave to that portion of the tribes who resided in Michigan the privilege of removing if they saw fit to the northern part of the peninsula, to a place called l'Arbre Croche, and residing there if they saw fit, on account of their religious creed.

Now, sir, to ask a lawyer to pronounce the clause I have just read a "condition" of the treaty, or to give it such a construction as would make it imperative on these Indians to remove to l'Arbre Croche, seems to me to be a very great absurdity—I speak it with the utmost respect to my friend from Iowa. It simply extended to them a privilege; they might go and reside there if they saw fit; and if they did go there, then their just proportion, for this is the language of the treaty, "their just proportion of the annuities" should be paid to them at l'Arbre Croche. It was simply changing the place of the payment of the amount which was justly due to them from the place where it otherwise would have been made to l'Arbre Croche. Such manifestly is the sole effect of this clause in the treaty.

I dislike, Mr. President, at this late hour of the day, to spend more time in consideration of this subject, and I will close by saying that the money which these Indians now ask for is their share of the purchase price of the land of which they were the owners in common with the rest of their tribe, and of the price of the reservations they sold in Michigan; that is the price of their interest in their reservations, in the five million acres of land they sold lying within the limits of Illinois, for which they have never received one dollar; and how gentlemen can rise here and say these men, who were once the owners of the land, and who claim nothing but their share of the purchase price of the land, are entitled to nothing, is more than I can understand.

Sir, in order to make this claim odious, and all persons connected with it odious, the honorable Senator from Iowa, utterly ignorant of the character of the Michigan Indians, assumes to call them vagrants and vagabonds of the earth. Let me ask that honorable Senator, if it shall ever happen to fall in his way, to enter one of the humble dwellings of these Michigan Indians, and he will find there a household as orderly, as industrious, as submissive to the laws, and as anxious to build up and uphold all the interests of society as most white men. They live by their own industry and the sweat of their brow; their own hands procure for them the livelihood they enjoy; they are almost all of them voters under the constitution of my State; and it seems to me a little hard that after depriving them of the price of their lands and the money which has been honestly due to them for so long a time, they should be denounced here as vagrants and vagabonds. Sir, they have waited patiently for the justice which they now ask; they are not clamorous even now; they are poor, and many of them ignorant; but they have not yet forgotten that they are subject to a country famous for its justice as well as its power. It is not the Michigan Indians, let me say to you, that have reddened the fields and the threshold of the pioneer and settler with the blood of the inmates. They have been guilty of no crime against either the Government or individuals. They are Christianized, civilized; and it is entirely unjust to charge them with being vagrants and vagabonds.

To conclude, then, Mr. President, for I will not detain the Senate, here is a claim which, although ancient, has been prosecuted diligently and kept alive by the claimants. It is nothing more than for the proper proportion of the purchase money due to the Michigan Indians for the lands they have sold to the United States, a proportion plainly recognized as being due to them by an express article in the treaty of September 27, 1833, and it seems to me little less than pettifoggery and quibbling to pretend that because, after removing to l'Arbre Croche, and finding it impossible to subsist there on account of the sterility of the soil and the severity of the climate, they returned to their old homes, they have forfeited their just claim to their share of that purchase money for their land. Sir, would my honorable friend from Iowa go into a court of equity and set up such a defense as he here interposes, in reply to a claim for the purchase money of land which his client should have sold? Would he insist that because the party did not happen to be at the particular place where it was to be paid he had therefore forfeited it? Sir, if you sue a party upon a note payable at a particular place, he cannot set up by way of defense of the claim that it was not presented at the place where it fell due. The honorable Senator from Iowa knows quite well that such is not the law. The place of payment may be a matter of convenience to the maker of the note, but it is no answer to a suit upon the note upon the merits that it was not presented at the place where it fell due. It may affect the question of costs, but it is no answer to the claim upon the merits; and this is precisely the case in the matter now before us.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand the direct question before the Senate to be on the amendment moved by the Senator from Iowa. I cannot support that amendment, and I think it strange that it should be offered by him. He has told the Senate that these Michigan Indians have no claim whatever, and yet his amendment goes on to put them upon an equal footing with the Indians in my State for all time to come. I am willing, and I think the Indians in my State would be willing, to settle with the Michigan Indians and pay them what has been due to them in the past. I think the report of the committee as it has been amended will be satisfactory. The joint resolution as it came from the House proposed to give these Michigan Indians $192,000. Our Indians were alarmed at that proposition; they thought it was entirely too large. That would give the Michigan Indians an equal participation in everything. The benefits that have accrued to this tribe in consequence of the removal, evidently the Michigan Indians should not enjoy; nor should they have a share in the increased value of the Indian lands in my State, for they have not been there. The proposition of the committee of the Senate to give the Michigan Indians $50,000 for their proportion of what was due under some former treaties is not so objectionable as the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, which is to give them an equal benefit in the sale of the lands in the future, and in all the money annuities; and he proposes to put upon that equal footing with our Indians those who, he says, have not a shadow of a claim.

Mr. HARLAN. I know the Senator from Kansas does not intend to misrepresent the position I have taken.

Mr. POMEROY. I speak of it as I understand it; perhaps I do not understand it.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator does substantially somewhat, but not entirely, understand it. If the amendment I propose shall not be adopted, and the joint resolution shall pass as amended by the Indian Committee, these Indians will in that case receive a much larger annuity than they are now receiving; they will receive their proportion of all annuities. The amendment I propose will give them something more than this from year to year hereafter.

Mr. POMEROY. That is what I object to.

Mr. HARLAN. My amendment will give them their proportion of the amount paid in money, but nothing of the land or what goes for the support of the millers, &c.

Mr. POMEROY. It is known that the Indians in my State have a very large and valuable tract of land, and the amendment of the Senator from Iowa allows the Michigan Indians to participate equally with our Indians in the benefits of that land.

Mr. HARLAN. Not at all. My amendment merely allows them to share in the proceeds of land heretofore sold and now drawing interest from year to year.

Mr. POMEROY. But placing the Michigan Indians on the same footing with our Indians makes them part and parcel of every payment that is made, not only to-day but in the future. There is no escape from it. I will not detain the Senate, as I see that everybody is anxious to vote on this question, and it is merely a question between two fragments of a tribe of Indians how a settlement between them shall be effected. I should have resisted the resolution as it came from the House of Representatives, paying the Michigan Indians $192,000, but as it has been before the committee a year, and they have made a kind of amicable adjustment, and settled upon $50,000, I would rather pass the resolution as it now stands; and it is better for the Indians in my State than to pass a measure which will make the Michigan Indians equal with ours for all time to come, and I prefer to sustain the report of the committee rather than this new amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. I think the adjustment of the matter made in this report by the committee is nearer equity at least. Exact justice we shall never get, but this approximates toward it, and I think we ought to stand by it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. My colleague differs with me entirely as to the desire of the Kansas Indians. I have seen them, or their agent, recently, and they claim that they do not owe a dollar, and that it is an outrage to permit one dollar to be taken from their funds and paid to the Michigan Indians.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know what their agents here may say, but I was in the tribe last fall and stopped at the St. Mary's Mission, and conversed with Bourassa and those old men who knew all about this matter, and they were willing to compromise the matter and pay something. I do not know what these agents may say; I have not seen one of them.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I speak of the Indians themselves, and I say they have an abhorrence to having a dollar taken from them and paid to the Michigan Indians. They claim, as the history of the case shows, that there was a full settlement made with the Michigan Indians by the Indian Bureau, and the sum of $1,500 a year was allowed to them, and has been paid to them and received by them in full settlement of all claim they had against the Kansas Indians. That was a full adjustment of the whole matter. This is a case fished up running through a series of thirty years, although the facts are that the claim was fully adjusted, and the Michigan Indians years ago accepted the amount paid by the Government as a settlement.

But, sir, I desire to make a suggestion to the Senate. If this resolution passes it impoverishes the wards of the Government in Kansas. The Senator from Iowa, for whose judgment in Indian matters I have great respect, now proposes a new basis of settlement. The Kansas Indians have an agent here. Now, I ask the Senate on behalf of these wards of the Government that they pass by this resolution informally till I can confer with that agent on the new basis tendered by the Senator from Iowa. I believe it has been the custom of the Senate when such a request is made by a Senator to accord to it. I think it especially addresses itself to the Senate, as these wards of the Government are interested in the question, and there is no Senator prepared to speak for them here as to the new basis proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to the resolution going over. I agree with my colleague in that suggestion.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will simply state that at this time there are upward of three hundred Winnebago Indians in the State of Wisconsin, the best paid tribe in the country, and they have not for twenty years participated in the annuities of the tribe because they did not remove with them. The object of the treaty undoubtedly was to induce these Indians to remove; they have not done so, and according to all the practice of the Government they have forfeited their interest in the annuities.

Mr. HARLAN. I feel pretty sure now that I am right. Both the Senators from Kansas, where a part of this tribe of Indians live, are opposed to my amendment; and both the Senators from Michigan, where the other part of them live, are opposed to it, the Michigan Senators insisting that it does not give those in Michigan enough.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Senator from Iowa should not make that statement so far as I am concerned. I desire to consult with the agent of the Indians as to the amendment. I express no opinion about it.

Mr. HARLAN. I accept the modification so far as the Senator is concerned. His colleague, however, says this amendment of mine will give the Michigan Indians too much. I think it will be right, but I shall not insist upon it against the sense of the Senate. If it is not adopted, however, I shall be compelled to go against the resolution as reported by the committee.

I wish to state, in relation to the argument of the Senator from Michigan, that he has not, I think, made himself familiar with the language of Indian treaties or he would not insist on the construction that he does. There certainly was an implied, if not an express, agreement on the part of these Indians to remove to their new reservation, and the language was put in which the Government had found to be the only available means of enforcing a removal, and that was to make the payment at the new reservation. While it may be true that in some treaties they are not required expressly in words to remove, yet it is provided that the payment shall be made at the new reservation, and the experience of the Government has been that there has been no other available mode of compelling a removal of the Indians but to withhold the payments until they do remove.

The Senator also took exception to my use of the word vagrant. I did not intend to use it in an offensive sense, nor as applicable to these Michigan Indians particularly, but to the different fragments of this nation of Indians scattered in different places among other Indian tribes in the State of Wisconsin as well as in Michigan.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from Iowa will give way I will suggest that this resolution pass over until to-morrow morning, he having the floor, as there is one other Indian bill that I want to dispose of before half past four o'clock, a bill in regard to Utah, which I think will lead to no discussion.

Mr. HARLAN. I yield to the suggestion of the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The joint resolution will be passed over informally.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move to take up House bill No. 222.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the question on that motion the Chair will present some bills from the House of Representatives, for the purpose of reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) declaring and defining the meaning of the law in regard to officers' servants;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 171) in the matter of Sergeant Daniel Collett, jr., deceased;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 172) to authorize the President to make transfers of officers in the Army of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 600) for the better organization of the subsistence department;

A bill (H. R. No. 653) to determine the rank of officers reëntering the military service;

A bill (H. R. No. 765) concerning regimental and garrison courts-martial; and

A bill (H. R. No. 767) to increase the pay of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes.

The bill (H. R. No. 698) to establish in the War Department a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees was read twice by its title, and referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to the British schooners Minnie Williams and E. M. Baxter was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MINT IN NEVADA.

Mr. NYE. I rise to ask the Senate to take up and concur in a House joint resolution upon which I am certain there can be no debate. It is a resolution that was passed by the House of Representatives last year and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary here, and they have reported it back without amendment. It is simply to confirm the title to lands in Carson, Nevada, upon which the mint is to be established.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the Senator will allow me to go on with the Indian bills.

Mr. NYE. This will not take longer than to read the resolution, and then I will stand by the Senator from Wisconsin and his Indian bills. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the title of certain property in Carson City and Territory of Nevada, for the purposes of a branch mint located in said place, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It recites that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in order to carry into effect an act entitled "An act to establish a branch mint of the United States in the Territory of Nevada," approved March 3, 1863, has purchased of Moses Job and Margaret, his wife, and James L. Riddle, the preceptors and occupants thereof, certain city or town lots in Carson City, together with all the valuable improvements thereon; and that it is highly important for the interest of the Government to obtain, at an early day, the use and possession of the property to establish and open the branch mint; and it therefore proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and accept from Moses Job and Margaret, his wife, and James L. Riddle, such relinquishments and conveyances of their right and claim to the lots and property as the Secretary shall deem sufficient for the relinquishment of any claim, right, or title which they may or can have thereto; and the lots and property are thereafter to be reserved from public sale, preemption, or homestead settlement, and to remain the property of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Nevada is now a State, and I move to amend the resolution by striking out "Territory" and inserting "State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the resolution to be read a third time. The resolution was read the third time, and passed; and its title was amended by striking out "Territory" and inserting "State."

INDIAN LANDS IN UTAH.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, the bill (H. R. No. 222) to extinguish the Indian title to lands in the Territory of Utah suitable for agricultural and mineral purposes was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to enter into treaties with the various tribes of Indians of Utah Territory, upon such terms as may be deemed just to the Indians and beneficial to the Government of the United States, for the absolute surrender to the United States, by those Indians, of their possessory right to all the agricultural and mineral lands in Utah Territory, except such agricultural lands as by said treaties may be set apart for reservations for the Indians; and these reservations are to be selected at points as remote as may be practicable from the present settlements in Utah Territory. In agreeing with the Indians upon the amounts to be paid to them under the provisions of the treaties to be negotiated, care is to be taken to obtain from the Indians, to the greatest possible extent, their consent to receive for such payments agricultural implements, stock, and other useful articles rather than money. The bill proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the purpose of negotiating the treaties and carrying out the provisions of the act, making presents to the Indians, and defraying the necessary expenses incident to the negotiation.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. McDUGALL. I have but one observation to make in this connection, not by way of opposition to this measure, but by way of commentary, after the fashion of the commentaries in Scott's Bible. The Indians are not being protected by this provision, and they are not considered here, whereas a darker colored race are being considered all the time.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

LUCY A. RICE.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 116) for the relief of Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, late of Richmond, Virginia.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not wish to have the joint resolution, on which the Senator from Iowa was upon the floor when it was laid aside informally, displaced.

Mr. HOWARD. Of course not; but this will only take a minute.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the joint resolution was resumed by the Senate.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

W. H. AND C. S. DUNCAN.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to take up Senate bill No. 311.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I object. The joint resolution on which the Senator from Iowa had the floor is now regularly before the Senate.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This bill only appropriates $200 80. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of W. H. & C. S. Duncan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $200 80 to be paid to W. H. & C. S. Duncan, of the city of Lawrence, Kansas, for compensation in full for goods and provisions furnished Captain Walker's company, Kansas militia, by order of Governor Geary, in 1856.

The bill having been read,

The VICE PRESIDENT announced that half past four o'clock having arrived, the Senate would take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate resumed its session at seven o'clock p. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of appropriations required for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Chippewas of Mississippi, and the Pillager and Lake Winnepigoshish bands of Chippewas in Minnesota, under the treaty of May 7, 1864, for the current fiscal year, and also for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

NATIONAL PROTECTION INSURANCE COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. DIXON, the bill (S. No. 386) to incorporate the National Protection Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The proposed incorporators are Richard Wallach, John H. Semmes, J. F. Callan, James T. Close, George S. Gidcon, John Farrell, Thomas J. Fisher, Thomas P. Morgan, Job Angus, O. A. Daily, Charles Wilson, George Lowry, and S. A. Peugh, and their present and future associates.

Mr. DIXON. I move to amend the bill by striking out, in lines nineteen and twenty of section four, the words "to be used in purchasing or discounting bonds, bills, notes, or other papers" after "security;" so as to leave the clause read, "the funds of this company may be invested in or loaned on a stock or real security."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I move further to amend the same section by striking out, in lines twenty, twenty-one, twenty-two, and twenty-three, the words:

Provided, That no greater rate of discount shall be taken than one half of one per cent. for thirty days, except as regards the bonds or certificates of debt of the United States or of corporations.

I think that is too great an amount of interest to be allowed; and I move to strike out the words entirely.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD CONNECTIONS.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 414) to authorize the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad eastward to Ontonagon, in the State of Michigan, and provide for its connection with the Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Canadian systems of railroads at Port Huron, Detroit, Toledo, Fort Wayne, and Dayton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK.) This evening having been set apart for executive business, no other business can be entertained except by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GRIMES. I object.

COMMITTEE ON THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. WADE. I offered this morning a concurrent resolution to authorize the continuance of the committee on the conduct of the war for thirty days after the termination of the present session.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent, and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WADE. I will state the reason for—Several SENATORS. Oh, no! we don't want any reason; it's all right.

Mr. WADE. Very well.

The resolution was agreed to.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. POWELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to withdraw his motion to allow me to have the joint resolution on which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] is entitled to the floor, taken up so as to be left as unfinished business.

Mr. POWELL. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians residing in Michigan the sum of $192,850.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now renew the motion that we go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This evening having been assigned for executive business, the Chair will direct the galleries to be cleared and the doors to be closed.

After some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 20, 1865.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. JOHN THURSH.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the first order of business, to the call of committees for reports, to go upon the Calendar, and not to be brought back by motion to reconsider.

JOHN A. HADDOCK.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of John A. Haddock; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees having been concluded, the next business in order during the remainder of the morning hour is the call of States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Pennsylvania.

SUBSTITUTE BROKERAGE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ANCONA introduced the following resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that a system of substitute brokerage has been practiced at the United States jail in this city by the officers in charge thereof, namely, Messrs. Robert Leah, warden, B. Muburn, deputy warden, Fayman and Robins, son, guards, and others not officers, enlisting and putting into the United States military service as substitutes persons under arrest and in confinement upon charges of criminal offenses, thereby defeating the ends of justice and doing great injury to the Army and community: Therefore, Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the facts of said allegations and report the same to the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I wish simply to remark that a resolution of this kind was introduced a few days since and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia. That committee is taking measures for the purpose of procuring the information desired by the resolution. I should be very glad to have this resolution referred to the same committee.

Mr. ANCONA. I have no objection to the change. I was not aware that a resolution had been introduced upon this subject. I will modify my resolution so as to substitute the Committee for the District of Columbia for the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask that the committee have leave to report at any time.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move that the Committee for the District of Columbia have power to send for persons and papers.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

INCREASED PAY OF CONGRESSMEN AND OTHERS.

Mr. ANCONA. In behalf of my colleague, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who is absent, I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and they are hereby, instructed to bring in a bill increasing the pay and allowances of members of Congress, and of clerks, messengers, and watchmen in the Government employment in this city twenty per cent., corresponding with the increased cost of living here over that in the other principal cities of the country.

Mr. KASSON. I understand that resolution to be absolute, and I object.

Mr. ANCONA. I am not at liberty to change the phraseology of the resolution. I offered it in behalf of my colleague, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I object to the resolution.

PAY OF A CONTESTANT.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to Hugh M. Martin the usual mileage and pay up to the day when he withdrew his contest before the Committee of Elections as a contestant for a seat in the Thirty-Eighth Congress as a Representative from the fourth district of the State of Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

Mr. ANCONA. I only propose to have it referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

Mr. COFFROTH. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to Hugh M. Martin the usual mileage and pay up to the day when he withdrew his contest before the Committee of Elections as a contestant for a seat in the Thirty-Eighth Congress as a Representative from the fourth district of the State of Iowa.

The House divided on seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 26, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ALLISON and COFFROTH were appointed.

Mr. NOBLE. I ask leave to say a word upon this question.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I object.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 58.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to debate the resolution.

Mr. NOBLE. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to refer the resolution.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution shall be reached that motion will be in order; but the gentleman from Ohio is familiar with the rule that if the previous question is not seconded, and any gentleman rises to debate the resolution, it goes over under the rule.

EXPORTATION OF COTTON.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I offer the resolution which I send to the Chair, to which I think there will be no objection. In case any gentleman should desire to discuss it, I move the previous question.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to consider the expediency of exporting to foreign markets for sale all cotton now in Government hands, so as to obtain for the Treasury the advantage of the higher price paid in Europe for that article, and thus, by placing abroad its proceeds to the credit of the Government, be enabled to import coin to that extent, or sell exchange, thereby enhancing the value of the currency, strengthening the credit of the Government, reducing the premium on gold, and producing other obvious advantages.

Mr. MORRILL. I object to the resolution.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. There can be no good reason for objecting to the resolution. It simply requests the Secretary of the Treasury to consider the propriety of doing this. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I insist on the objection.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Then I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Upon seconding the demand for the previous question the House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FERNANDO WOOD and FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. MORRILL rising to debate the resolution, it was laid over under the rule.

ASSIGNMENT OF QUOTAS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be hereby directed to communicate to this House at an early day the basis upon which the quotas of the different districts of each State have been established and adjusted under calls for troops by the President of the United States, together with a detailed statement of the number of troops and seamen furnished by each State and district, congressional or otherwise, since the outbreak of the rebellion, with their respective terms of service.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, it requires unanimous consent on this day.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, objected.

JOHN ERICSSON.

Mr. TOWNSEND introduced a bill for the relief of John Ericsson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

ACCOUNTS OF POSTMASTER.

Mr. ELIOT submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that the Postmaster General shall have authority, in his discretion, to give credit to postmasters, in settlement of their accounts, for losses of postage stamps by burglary or theft, and without their fault or negligence, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The call of States and Territories for resolutions having been completed, the next business in order, under the rule, is the taking up of resolutions calling for executive information which laid over one day under the rule.

GOLD SALES BY THE TREASURY.

The first resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House what, if any, amount of gold in the Treasury of the United States not necessary for the payment of interest on the public debt has been disposed of under the joint resolution approved March 17, 1864; what amounts, and the various times when the same were disposed of; at what rates, and what agents were employed in the transaction.

Mr. COX demanded the previous question.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. COX. I ask that the resolution be read again for the information of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. KELLOGG,] for he evidently misunderstands it.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. COX. I would like to modify the resolution, which I think will make it acceptable, by inserting after the words "public debt" the words "and for the purposes of the sinking fund."

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I insist upon my motion to lay on the table.

Upon that motion the House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 41.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. COX called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 60, nays 58, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John B. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyd, Brundage, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Elliot, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Perham, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. CALIFORNIA TROOPS.

The next resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War, if not incompatible with the public service, be directed to communicate to this House what is the number of troops furnished by the State of California to the General Government under the various calls, and whether the draft has been enforced in that State as in other States, and if not, the reason for its non-enforcement.

Mr. McKINNEY. On the adoption of this resolution I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

REFUNDING OF COMMUTATION MONEY.

The next resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that under the call made by the President for three hundred thousand troops on the 4th day of May, 1864, in order to fill their quotas some of the districts made a supplemental draft subsequent to the passage of the act regulating the subject, of July 4, 1864, which supplemental drafts were declared illegal, and the persons thus drafted were ordered to be discharged therefrom, and when commutation had been paid it was also ordered that the same should be refunded, which has not been done; and whereas it is also alleged that in many instances the persons who had thus paid commutation were, within a very short period thereafter, again drafted under the subsequent call and compelled to enter the service of the United States, and whose families are now suffering for the want of the return of said commutation: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House why the said commutations have not been refunded without so much delay.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PRISONERS FOR POLITICAL OFFENSES, ETC.

The next resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested, and that the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War be directed, to report and furnish to this House the names of all persons, if any there are, who have been arrested and are now held in imprisonment or confinement in any prison, fort, or other place whatsoever, for political offenses or any other alleged offense against the Government or authority of the United States, by the order, command, consent, or knowledge of them, or either of them respectively, and who have not been charged, tried, or convicted before any civil or criminal, not military, court of the land, together with the charge against each person, or cause for such arrest and imprisonment, except only such persons who may at the time of their arrest have been in the military or naval service of the United States, together with the name of the prison, fort, or place where they are severally kept or confined; also whether any person or persons, for any alleged like offense, have been banished or sent from the United States, or from the States not in rebellion to the rebellious States; and the names, times, alleged offenses or cause thereof, and whether with or without trial; and if tried, before what court.

Mr. KERNAN. I move the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Would it be in order to move the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs, who already have this subject under consideration?

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order while the demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 58, not voting 70, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. THAYER stated that his colleague, Mr. O'NEILL, was absent on account of sickness.

The result was announced as above stated.

Mr. MORRILL. If the previous question be not seconded, will it be in order to move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It will. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

LEAVE TO VOTE.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask, by unanimous consent, for leave to have my vote recorded in the passage of the Wisconsin and Michigan land-grant railroad bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I vote in the negative.

CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WILSON. I submit the following privileged report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to House bill No. 583, an act to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, have met, and after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House concur in the first amendment of the Senate, with the following amendment: in line eleven strike out the word "volunteers" and in lieu thereof insert the words "volunteer or other forces."

That the House concur in the second amendment of the Senate with the following: strike out of the seventh line of said amendment the word "descend" and in lieu thereof insert the words "be paid;" and after the word "heirs" in the same line insert the words "or legal representatives."

That the conferees recommend that the Senate recede from its third amendment to said bill.

That the House concur in the Senate amendment to the title.

HENRY WILSON,

JAMES M. GRIMES,

H. S. LANE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES F. WILSON,

E. R. ECKLEY,

W. H. WADSWORTH,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment which the Senate attached to the House bill provided that the conferring of brevet rank upon officers of the Army should not carry with it an increase of pay. Under the present system increase of pay is granted to officers of brevet rank in the regular Army. The amendment which the committee of conference have made is to include them with officers of other forces, to put regular, mariepe, and other officers upon the same footing.

The other amendment is merely formal.

The third amendment of the Senate was one whereby it was provided that no alien who had been in the United States for five years prior to April, 1861, and who, if naturalized would have been subject to military duty, shall not hereafter be naturalized, any law to the contrary notwithstanding. The Senate recede from that amendment, as it will be readily perceived it might interfere with the naturalization of a great many persons who are meritorious, the cases of those who were minors prior to April, 1861; and also of those persons who had declared their intentions to become citizens of the United States, and whose declaration had not been made two years prior to that date. In order to avoid the difficulties to arise from that amendment the Senate agreed to recede.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not understand the gentleman in regard to brevet rank.

Mr. WILSON. It puts the regular and volunteer officers upon the same footing.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I should be much better pleased if the committee had made an amendment to give those who are in command of a brigade the pay of a brigadier general, whether they are brigadier generals or colonels. An officer should not only have the pay commensurate with his rank, but commensurate with the duty which he performs. The old law, as I understand, which authorizes the President to confer brevet rank upon officers of the Army, authorizes them to receive pay when they are assigned to duty commensurate with the brevet rank. I think that this bill ought to be amended to confer the same upon the volunteer officers. Certainly there should be no distinction between officers of the regular and the volunteer force. We should give them all the pay when they are upon the duty commensurate with the brevet rank.

We have, sir, in the service of the United States colonels who have been commanding brigades for two years, and who are simply drawing the pay of colonels. Many of them have been brevetted brigadier generals and are commanding divisions. They should in justice have the pay.

Mr. WILSON. I think there is a great deal of force in some of the suggestions of the gentleman from Illinois; but there is no reason why a person holding the rank and having the position of brigadier general should have more pay than a colonel who performs the same service. We all know that a large number of brigades in the service are commanded by colonels. An officer in the regular Army as a brevet brigadier general can draw pay and an officer in the volunteer cannot. We propose to put them upon the same footing.

I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that call for a moment.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to inquire how this report, if adopted, will affect the laws with reference to naturalization?

Mr. WILSON. It makes no change whatever.

Mr. KERNAN. It leaves them as they are?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to detain the House but a few moments. I know I will be pardoned for speaking upon this subject, in consideration that this is a purely military bill, and the Committee on Military Affairs were not at all represented in the committee of conference. There are features of this report of the committee of conference which induce me to disagree from that report, and to hope that it will not be agreed to by the House.

And first, as to this matter of brevet rank; I entirely agree with the principle adopted by the committee of conference, including both branches of it, that no distinction should be made as to compensation or any advantage conferred by brevet rank between the officers of the regular Army and other officers of the Army belonging to the volunteer forces. I think they should all be put upon the same footing. And I am more inclined to this because in this, as in many other cases, by putting them upon this equal footing we rebut that presumption that has grown up that officers of the volunteer corps are not to be regarded as in the Army at all.

It is a favorite idea at the War Department, and certainly among officers of the regular Army, that there is some magic in the word "Army" that does not include volunteers who are fighting in behalf of their country. And in courts-martial when organized and upon all other occasions a distinction is sought to be drawn between the Army of the United States and the volunteers in the service of the United States, as if the volunteers were but militia. I deny that; and I hold that it is the duty of Congress to defend upon all occasions the volunteers in the service of the United States against the presumption that they are not as much—being mustered into that service—employed by the United States as a portion of its Army, as any other forces in the field. Why, the distinction, I understand, between the militia and volunteers is a problem. Your militia organization, there being no general national militia law, is an organization which is instituted under the legislation of the several States; and when the militia of the States therefore, there being no militia of the United States properly so-called, is called into the service of the United States it goes into the service in its organization given it under the State laws. Whole divisions, brigades, and regiments, with officers of divisions, brigades, and regiments are bodily taken up as it were and transferred for the time being to the service of the United States.

It is not so at all with volunteers. Volunteers are raised under the laws of the United States. Volunteers—officers and men—come into the service of the United States, and are regularly mustered into the service; and it is the only original service in which they are engaged; and the laws of the United States, acting as a national law, operate directly upon the individual, and bring the individual under the control and into the service of the United States as a Government without going through any transition state, or without being embodied into the militia of the States.

It may be said that they are to be regarded only as the militia of the country, because all of their officers under the grade of general officers are commissioned by the Governors of States. We employ the Governors of the several States to commission field and line officers only as the agents of the General Government. The General Government calls the volunteers into the service of the United States, not as having been a part of the militia of the States, but as raised in the several States under national legislation, and the Governors of the States acting as agents of the General Government in giving the commissions. But the moment the commission is granted and the officers are mustered into the service of the United States the State control ceases and it has no further power over them. The Governors are then functus officio as regards their agency for the United States, and all further control ceases over officers mustered into the service of the United States.

I make these general remarks because officers of volunteers, being equal to those of the regular Army, and being part of the Army of the United States and of the great national forces of the country, there ought not to be any distinction made in this way between them; and these distinctions in regard to brevet rank are properly repudiated by the conferees upon both sides. But I disagree to the conclusion. I disagree that, while they are put upon the same level and upon the same footing, they ought to be denied altogether.

either in the regular Army or in the volunteer forces, any advantage in the way of compensation by reason of brevet rank for the duties really performed by them. I hold that, on the contrary, instead of both being put upon the same level, and that level being to be deprived of all compensation on account of this brevet rank and the duties discharged under the brevet commissions, they ought to be put upon the same level, but that that level ought to be pay to both of them. I hold that where brevet rank is assigned, whether it be to a regular Army officer or to an Army officer of the volunteer forces, in either case, if the officer be assigned to duty according to that brevet rank, if, for instance, as a colonel he commands a brigade and undertakes all the responsibilities and performs all the functions of a brigadier general and is compelled to maintain the position of a brigadier general, and not only to incur that responsibility but to meet any additional expenses involved in this elevation of position, he ought to be paid for such services.

I hope, therefore, that the report of the committee of conference will be rejected, and that if the amendment of the Senate is to be modified it will be modified in another way, and the Senate will be called upon to agree to put, as the Committee on Military Affairs proposes to do, these officers upon the same footing, but that that footing shall be the receiving of compensation for brevet rank when assigned to service corresponding to that rank.

Mr. GANSON. I would ask the gentleman whether when brevet rank is conferred on a regular Army officer to the command of volunteers he draws the same pay that he would do if not assigned to the command of volunteers.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir.

Mr. GANSON. Why should he not?

Mr. SCHENCK. What I mean is this: if a regular Army officer is brevetted and specially assigned to duty corresponding with his brevet rank, while doing the duty of that brevet rank he should receive the pay of his brevet rank; that is to say, when a colonel or captain of the regular Army is brevetted a brigadier general and is assigned to the duty of his brevet rank he should receive pay as a brigadier general.

Mr. GANSON. Suppose he is assigned by brevet as a brigadier general of volunteers?

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I presume he counts as a volunteer officer.

Mr. GANSON. Why should there be any distinction? When an officer of the regular Army is brevetted as a brigadier general of volunteers, why should he not have the pay of a brigadier general?

Mr. SCHENCK. I say there ought not to be any distinction. I say that every brevet rank ought to carry along with it the pay of that brevet rank when the duties are actually performed.

Mr. GANSON. Why should they not all be placed upon an equality by giving to volunteer officers the same pay that regular Army officers now draw?

Mr. SCHENCK. That is just what I am contending for.

Mr. GANSON. I am happy to find that I agree with the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee of conference have agreed to the idea that they shall be put upon the same footing. That, I contend, is right. But what is that footing? Why, that neither of them shall receive pay.

Mr. GANSON. That is all wrong.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now I say that they should receive pay for the rank to which they are assigned.

Mr. WILSON. I must now claim the floor. I think I have given away enough of my time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, considering that the Committee on Military Affairs, this being purely a military bill, were not represented at all on the committee of conference, I think I have not imposed on the patience of the House or of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILSON. I do not regard it as any imposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that this bill emanated from the Judiciary Committee of the House and was acted on by the Judiciary Committee in the Senate. The Committee on Military Affairs took no cognizance of it when it came back from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I beg leave to explain. I mean to say that the matters in dispute between the two Houses are purely of a military character.

The SPEAKER. That may be, but the gentleman from Ohio did not claim any cognizance of the bill when it came back from the Senate and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee did.

Mr. SCHENCK. I never heard of it. Without complaining of the fact that there was no representation of the Military Committee upon the committee of conference, I think we at least should be heard, as we have decided opinions upon this subject.

Mr. WILSON. I think the gentleman has been heard. I acknowledge the extensive jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs; I know it extends to almost everything; but I am not prepared to yield the principle that a bill that originates in the Judiciary Committee, or in any other appropriate committee of this House, must pass under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Military Committee, merely because the Senate see proper to put a military amendment upon that bill.

This bill originated with the Judiciary Committee of this House. When it went to the Senate it related solely to the subject of naturalization; extending to persons in the Navy the same privileges in regard to naturalization that were extended by the act of 1862 to persons in the Army. That was all there was in the bill. The Senate amended it so as to prevent an increase of pay following the conferring of brevet rank. It is true that had nothing to do with naturalization; but because of that it does not transfer the bill to the jurisdiction of the Military Committee. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has not very well considered the subject of brevet rank and brevet pay, notwithstanding he is the chairman of the Military Committee. I do not understand that it was ever contemplated to establish the policy of conferring brevet rank and carrying increased pay with it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will ask the gentleman whether prior to this war it has ever been otherwise, when the assignment was made by the President?

Mr. WILSON. I am speaking of the legislation of Congress upon this subject since the commencement of this rebellion. The reason for brevet rank embodied in the act itself is, that in order that meritorious officers may be recognized in some way for the distinguished services that they may have performed, they may have this recognition by being promoted to a brevet rank. But it never was contemplated that that promotion should carry with it increased pay.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] says that they should all be placed upon an equal footing. That I admit, and that is just what this amendment proposes to do. It does not, as the gentleman contends that it should, increase the pay of brevet officers; but it provides that none who are promoted to brevet rank shall have an increase of pay. I would like to have the gentleman, although he be the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, tell me why a colonel commanding a brigade is not as much entitled to an increase of pay as a colonel who has been brevetted a brigadier, where he is discharging the duties of a brigadier.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman allow me to answer?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very glad of it, for I was cut off in the midst of my remarks before. I hold that that should be one of the objects of this legislation. The Senate has refused to pass a bill to drop unemployed generals. There are colonels almost by the hundred commanding brigades. They can be brevetted, because there is no limitation upon that power, and being brevetted, if they actually perform the duties corresponding to the brevet rank, that is, if being brevetted brigadier generals they act as brigadier generals, then I contend that whether they belong to the regular Army or are volunteer officers, they ought to be paid as brigadier generals, only, however, for the time they are assigned to this particular duty. When they fall back to their position in the line, and, although they are enjoying the brevet rank, are not performing the duties that pertain to that brevet rank, then I would have them paid according to their position in the line. That is what I mean. It is to meet that class of cases, where enormous injustice is done to colonels and other officers who are fighting your battles, that I would give them this brevet rank and pay when they are performing the duties pertaining to that brevet rank. I would go further; I would set aside a large number of general officers who are not performing the duties pertaining to their rank, and make absolute promotions of these colonels. That has been tried by this House, but has failed on account of the lack of concurrence on the part of the other branch of Congress.

Mr. WILSON. I shall not differ from the gentleman in regard to that; for I voted with him on the passage of the bill to which he refers.

But, sir, the gentleman certainly has not considered the financial phase of this question. What will be the increased expense to the Government of the United States if all the brevet officers are to have the full pay of the rank to which they have been brevetted?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have never claimed anything of that kind. There are very few officers in command now who will receive, under my proposition, the full pay of the rank to which they have been brevetted. There are men brevetted to captaincies who will still receive the pay of lieutenants. It is only where a man is brevetted, and by special assignment of the President is given the command which pertains to the brevet, that I would have him receive the pay of that rank.

Mr. WILSON. I understand the position of the gentleman exactly. But I have not yet discovered any reason why a lieutenant commanding a company, but upon whom the brevet rank has not been conferred, is not entitled to as much pay as if he held the brevet rank. Yet, sir, if we are to establish the principle or policy of paying to all lieutenants who may command companies, to all colonels who may command brigades, to all brigadier generals who may command divisions, the pay of captains, or brigadier generals, or major generals, as the case may be, I think it is not difficult to see that we shall place upon the Treasury a very onerous burden.

Therefore I think it best that we should pursue the policy which Congress intended to establish when the act in relation to conferring brevet rank was passed; that is, that the rank should be a recognition upon the part of the Government of the distinguished services performed by the officer, and that it should not be coupled with an increase of pay.

I now demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman withdraw that call and allow me to say one word?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman asked why we should not declare that every person who performs the duties of a command should have the pay of that command, whether he has the brevet rank or not. I answer that there are two considerations which should entitle a man to increased pay: first, that he is doing the duty of the place to which he has been assigned; and second, that his services are of so distinguished a character as to entitle him to the rank. Where those two qualifications center in one man it seems to me perfectly proper that he should receive the pay of the rank to which he is brevetted. A man may accidentally, by the mere fortunes of war, command his brigade for a few days. I would not say that such a man should receive advanced pay. But when a man has performed such distinguished service that the President of the United States deems him fit to be adorned with a brevet, and when he has been thus adorned, and is also by special assignment doing the duty of the rank to which he is brevetted, I think it nothing but justice that he should receive the pay of that rank.

Mr. WILSON. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs proposes that this pay shall be allowed because of the service performed by the officer in the command, the duties of which he may exercise.

Mr. SCHENCK. Only in connection with the brevet. The gentleman continually misstates every proposition submitted by me.

Mr. WILSON. I am not misstating.

I will suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that Congress has already established the policy of limiting the number of general officers; it provided that there should not be more than a certain number (I do not now recall the number) of brigadier generals and major general als. That was intended, in part, as a measure for the protection of the Treasury of the country. But if we are to declare that a brevet rank shall carry with it the full pay of that rank we in effect repeal that act of Congress.

Mr. GANSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that if he wants to protect the Treasury he should procure the discharge of many of the brigadier generals and major generals who are not in service. The President has the power to do it.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman voted against the bill which had that object in view.

Mr. GANSON. The President has the power now, and if he wants to protect the Treasury he can exercise it.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday this House passed a bill to increase the pay of officers beneath the rank of brigadier generals twenty-five per cent. It does seem to me that so far as the mere question of pay is concerned that is sufficient. But if we are to follow the policy now advocated by the Committee on Military Affairs we shall in effect destroy this system of conferring brevet rank.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman from Iowa and the House will remember that the House has twice passed a bill to provide for retiring from the Army unemployed general officers, for the purpose of lessening the number of that rank drawing pay out of the Treasury of the United States, but the Senate have studiously and persistently defeated the action of the House in that direction. While they propose to limit the number of brigadier and major generals in the Army, they refuse to agree with the House in providing a method for getting rid of these superabundant major and brigadier generals in the Army who are not performing the duty which lower officers are performing. While they are doing that, while the responsibility is now upon the Senate for the drones about the country who are performing no duty but drawing their pay from the Treasury, they refuse to allow a man who has earned his brevet and who is performing the duty commensurate with that brevet to draw the pay. The responsibility is upon the Senate. When the Senate will pass our bill and get rid of these unnecessary officers then the men who have been justly said to be adorned with brevet rank will get full pay. But until that time, while these men are performing this meritorious duty by assignment as brevet major generals and brigadier generals, I say that it is gross injustice to refuse to pay them according to their brevet rank.

Mr. WILSON. The policy which the gentleman wishes to carry out will prevent this rank by brevet from adorning any more officers of the Army; for if it is found, as I have already said, that it will carry increase of pay not only to those who have been already brevetted but to those who will be brevetted in the future, as a matter of course the President must stop brevetting, because we cannot stand the additional expense.

I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that the demand for the previous question will be voted down, for the gentleman's last remark shows that he does not understand the question.

Mr. WILSON. I understand it quite as well as the gentleman.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 62.

Mr. WILSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, as I was not permitted to complete the remarks which I was submitting before, because the gentleman would not spare time, I am glad of time for additional discussion and consideration. And before I make any further remarks let me say again that I am not to be understood as complaining that no member of the Military Committee was put upon this committee of conference, but I mean to be understood in this wise: that a bill relating to some matter pertaining to the Judiciary Committee passed this House and went to the Senate, and the Senate put upon that bill an amendment pertaining purely and exclusively to the Committee on Military Affairs, principally in regard to the matter of brevet rank; and therefore, as the gentleman represents, the Judiciary Committee had charge in the committee of conference, attention not being called to it. And we are told that the difference between the two Houses is not the main matter of the bill, but a military matter which had been ingrafted upon the bill. It was not asking too much, when that subject had been considered by the Military Committee, that we should be heard on the subject. I know that the Military Committee of the Senate entertained views that nobody having brevet rank, whether regular or volunteer, should have the pay, while discharging the duty, of that brevet rank, while I was decidedly of the opinion that when they were assigned to duty they should have the pay corresponding to the brevet rank. While I agree, therefore, in the general idea on the part of the conference committee on the part of the House and Senate, that they should be all put upon the same footing, I disagree to the report in regard to what that footing is to be.

The gentleman has unnecessarily thrown his flings upon the Military Committee. I repeat what I have said before. I only came into this debate because it is in reference to a matter purely and exclusively relating to that class of subjects intrusted to the committee of which I am chairman. Whether I know much or little, or whether the Military Committee is competent or incompetent to consider these matters, it is possible that they know as much about them as the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. We claim no exclusive knowledge on this or any other subject. The flings were unnecessary and uncalled for.

Mr. WILSON. They only came because called for by the statement of the gentleman now upon the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. That may be a matter of opinion. They were unsustained by any proposition made either by myself or either of my colleagues on that committee during the little opportunity we had of being heard by interpolating remarks during the time the gentleman from Iowa claimed for himself before he sought to call the previous question.

The proposition I made is so continually misunderstood, if not misrepresented, by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. Wilson,] that I repeat it. I have not said that brevet rank ought to carry along with it a compensation corresponding with the rank thus conferred. I have said that where for meritorious services an officer has been honored by that rank by the President of the United States he ought to have, in consequence of that rank, the pay pertaining to it when he is called upon by special assignment of the President to perform the duty pertaining to a command appropriate to the rank.

Now, when we make brevet officers by the hundreds and thousands, and a great many have been made, they carry along with them the recognition of the military services of the officers upon whom that rank has been conferred, but they do not carry with them, nor has any one of the members of the Military Committee nor anybody else in this Hall, that I know of, ever claimed, as represented by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that this brevet rank should carry along with it the compensation.

Mr. WILSON. If I misunderstood the gentleman, of course I wish to be corrected; but I put this question to the gentleman: why should not a colonel, commanding a brigade, have increased pay corresponding with his command, if that increase of pay is given to a colonel who has been brevetted a brigadier?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will answer the gentleman, and in answering I will have to repeat what my colleague said. A lieutenant sometimes commands a company, and does the duty of a captain; a captain may command a regiment; or a major or colonel may command a brigade. That is an accident of the service. It is one of the chances of the service; but it is not proposed when by the chances of the service a man may temporarily be in such a position, no matter how long it may continue, he shall therefore have the pay of the command in which he is employed. But if a man who thus commands has been honored by an increased rank for meritorious services, and has been specially assigned by the President to that command as one pertinent to his ability and position, all these things concurring make up a case which entitles him to pay.

We do not claim, nor has any one pretended, that any chance command of a company by a lieutenant, or a chance command of a brigade by a colonel, shall carry along with it pay; but we say that where a man has been selected for his distinguished character and services and the increased rank has been given him by brevet, and that is followed up by a special assignment to a command corresponding to the brevet rank, then he should have the pay of that rank. That is all we contend for. And I say that was the law before this war. In 1818 a law was passed which, in regulating the pay of brevet officers, provided that brevet officers shall be entitled to receive the pay and emoluments of brevet rank when the duty and command were according to their brevet rank, and at no other time; and that no brevet commission should thereafter be conferred except by the consent and advice of the Senate.

Some two years or more ago an act was passed by Congress empowering the President to confer this distinguished honor of brevet rank upon volunteers as well as upon officers of the regular Army. That law stood upon the statute-book a year and a half before any brevet rank was conferred upon any volunteer officer; but the pressure soon became so great that the President began to confer the rank, and now many volunteer officers hold a brevet rank. But Congress provided in that law that such brevet rank should not carry along with it pay, even when specially assigned to a command corresponding with the brevet rank. And the disbursing officers in the pay department have construed that not to be a limitation upon those brevetted in the regular Army, but that they should have their pay. Thus an invidious distinction was made between officers of the regular Army and officers of the volunteer corps. The Senate come forward and now say they will not elevate the volunteer officers to the condition of the officers of the regular Army, and give them, when specially assigned to duty, pay according to the rank, but will drag down the Army officers to the level of the volunteer officers. I say it is all wrong. I am radical in my opinions upon this subject. I say that the idea ought to be just reversed, and that volunteer officers should be elevated to a condition to enjoy the same advantages which were given to the officers of the regular Army, and I would make no distinction between them.

But to repeat the proposition, I would give to the officer, not when he is brevetted, but when, as will only happen perhaps once in a hundred cases, he is not only brevetted but by special assignment of the President is directed to take command corresponding to the rank given to him by brevet, the pay also which corresponds to that rank.

I hope now that I am understood, although the chairman of the Judiciary Committee seemed to have some difficulty in comprehending the proposition that I made.

Mr. WILSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that there are some cases in which the remedy proposed by him would act very unjustly. I have in my mind several colonels who have for the last year been commanding brigades and divisions. I am reminded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKLEY] of one case where a colonel has been commanding a brigade for two years or more. I know that many of these officers were recommended by their superior officers, and among them General Sherman, for promotion long ago. They were not promoted, but they were assigned to these commands, some of them because of their merit as officers and not merely by the accidents of service; and yet they have been discharging those duties belonging to a higher grade without advanced pay. Now, it does seem to me that if they are discharging the same grade and class of duties that brevet officers would be called on to discharge if we give additional pay to brevet rank, it ought also to be given to colonels who have performed the same duties without brevet; and yet I do not understand that the gentleman's proposition includes those cases.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not yield to the gentleman in the sympathy that I have—and I think the House has had some reason to believe that I have such sympathy—with these colonels commanding brigades. I have been trying in various forms to come to their relief for two years, but the Senate will not agree to it.

Mr. WILSON. I do not put it on the ground of sympathy.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, then, justice.

Mr. WILSON. I think we should not increase the pay unless we increase the rank.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand that. The gentleman's position is that nobody should have the pay of advanced rank unless he is absolutely promoted to that advanced rank, and that is just what I object to. We cannot get them advanced rank absolutely. This House has tried to make way for some of these colonels, that they may be promoted actually, but they cannot do it. Now, let us do the next best thing that we can; inasmuch as the President may brevet them without vacancies, let the President brevet them, for instance colonels discharging the duties of brigadier generals, in just such cases as those named by the gentleman from Iowa, and then, being brevetted, let them be brought within the old law that related to the regular Army by special assignment to their commands, and give them the benefit of the advanced pay. That is what I contend for, instead of turning round and saying that they may have brevet rank, but that so far as compensation and meeting their expenses are concerned, it shall be an empty honor, and no more.

Instead of what I advocate it is proposed to pull down the officers of the regular Army from where they have been since 1818, and put them on a level with volunteer officers in regard to a denial of this compensation. I admit that under ordinary circumstances command ought to carry corresponding pay; but we cannot cover all cases, and therefore what I propose to do is that where the command is by special assignment and the officer who has the command has been meritorious enough to get a brevet to that rank of which he is performing the duties, that all these things concurring, he shall have the pay of that rank also. That is the whole of what I propose, nothing more and nothing less.

Now, as to the matter of economy; I am not terrified, even considering the depressed condition of the currency, and the difficulties under which we labor in regard to all the relations of the Government during this most exhausting war in consequence of our finances, by the objection made by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. The truth is that comparatively very few officers would derive the benefit of this law, if you make it as I propose. I repeat, it is not, as the gentleman keeps claiming, every one who is brevetted who would enjoy the compensation of the increased rank. But when you come to special assignments, as since the passage of the law of 1818 has been the case in the regular Army, where the President of the United States has assigned an officer to a special command corresponding with his brevet rank, then compensation should follow. If they are numerous enough to embrace the fifty or the hundred colonels who are now commanding brigades and divisions, some of them, as I well know, having been exercising those commands for two years or more, then let that compensation be given to them, although it may amount to a considerable amount of money. I do not know how we can more worthily bestow our money as compensation for services actually rendered, than to give it to those meritorious officers who have performed the duty while others have been enjoying the emoluments.

I admit that our correction does not cure the whole evil. I admit that vacancies should be made in those places now held by officers who perform no duties, and those officers promoted to those places. But as we cannot do all we want done, in consequence of the want of action on the part of the Senate and also on the part of the President, let us go as far as we can, and at least provide for all that class of officers who are presumed to be among the most meritorious, selected for brevet, and who do the duty corresponding to their brevet rank. Let us at least do that, if we cannot do all we would.

I have an objection to another feature of that report of the committee of conference in relation to the naturalization law. I think if the gentleman had concurred in what the Senate had done, putting in a limitation in regard to persons who have come of age, and other restrictions of that kind, there is a portion of good in that amendment which it would have been well for us to adopt. I should have preferred that the committee of conference had reported differently on that subject.

I hope we will not concur in this report, but that, rejecting it, we may have another committee of conference, so that the attempt may be made to bring the Senate to take the same view that I have been trying to express in regard to this matter. For, while the Senate and the House agree that all these officers ought to be put upon the same level, it should be a leveling up, and not a leveling down. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly, and I will give way to him unlimitedly, and not for a few moments merely.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman admits that the action of the committee of conference is proper enough in relation to the amendment which the Senate sends to the House concerning the naturalization law. He admits that that is not a good amendment; we thought so, too.

One word more, and then I propose to demand the previous question on this report. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] insists that a brevet officer, who shall be assigned by the President to a particular command corresponding to his brevet rank, shall have the pay of the full rank. Now, sir, I understand, and I think the history of the Army will bear me out, that it has not always been the most meritorious officer who has been assigned to a particular command by the President of the United States. General Sherman, leading his triumphant army through the rebellious States, having under his eye every officer, knows better than the President of the United States who should be assigned to a particular command in that army. And yet under the policy which the gentleman advocates, the assignment made by General Sherman would be overridden by the assignment of the President of the United States, which might be brought about solely by influences here at the capital, without regard to the services which the officer was performing in the field. I understand, sir, that they are conferred. I understand, too, that many of General Sherman's recommendations for promotion have lain in the pigeon-holes of the War Department for two years without action.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. There was no room for the promotions to be made.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman tells me that there was no room. Was there not room in the brevet grade? I say that the President might have conferred this brevet rank. I say that General Sherman could determine who of those under him were most meritorious. But it is not proposed to permit General Grant and General Sherman, who have tested and tried the officers under them, who know better than any others the value of their services and the meritorious character of those services, to designate those who shall receive additional pay; but the President, influenced by members of Congress, members of the Senate, friends of these officers who are about the Capitol, is to confer the rank and pay upon these men who are discharging duty in the field.

Now, sir, I hope that the House will adopt this report. Then let this whole subject be reported upon by the Committee on Military Affairs, and then we can determine whether the President, in thus advancing officers, shall follow the assignment of the officer who has most knowledge concerning the meritorious conduct of the officer promoted.

I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 25, noes 60.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House still further insist on its disagreement, and ask the appointment of a new committee of conference. The motion was agreed to.

TREATY STIPULATIONS WITH INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting estimates of appropriations required for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Chippewas of the Mississippi, and Pillager and Lake Winnebagoish bands of Chippewas of Minnesota, under the treaty of the 7th May, 1864; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1864.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of Agriculture, transmitting his annual report for 1864, with accompanying documents; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HULBURD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed one hundred and fifty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1864, for the use of this House, and thirty thousand copies for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing, under the law.

BRIGADIER GENERAL G. W. MORGAN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, February 17, 1865.

SIR: In reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives, dated February 26, 1864, calling for a copy of the communication from Brigadier General G. W. Morgan, dated Mount Vernon, Ohio, June 6, 1863, with the exhibits thereto attached, marked from A to Q, being in reply to a portion of the official report of Major General Halleck, dated December 2, 1862, in relation to the evacuation of Cumberland Gap, I have the honor to state that the communication of General Morgan was a stricture upon an official paper from Major General Halleck, which was made by General Morgan after he left the service, which he was not called upon by the Department to make, and which does not properly belong to its files. It is not a paper that can with propriety be officially furnished from this Department.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COX. I should like to have that referred to some committee, to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I make that motion. I was promised by the Secretary of War that this communication should come here. This resolution was passed at the last session of Congress, and it was not complied with. It was proposed to expurgate the report in reference to certain matters, and that then it should be sent here. This communication therefore astonishes me. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, in order that there may be some action on the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I now ask to have entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the communication was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, proposing to call it up at some other time.

RESOLUTIONS OF INDIANA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, as follows, which were ordered to be printed, and referred as indicated below:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of Indiana asking that those of the militia and independent companies of that State who have been wounded or injured in battle with the enemy, and the families of those who have been killed, shall be placed upon the pension list—Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A joint resolution of the Legislature of Indiana asking an extension of time for the construction of the Grand Rapids and Indiana railroad—Committee on Public Lands.

A joint resolution of the Legislature of Indiana in favor of the improvement of the harbor of Michigan City, Indiana—Committee on Commerce.

PROTEST OF MARYLAND LEGISLATURE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House resolutions unanimously adopted by the Legislature of Maryland, protesting against Congress authorizing any railroad within the limits of that State to connect with the Northern Central railroad, and requesting that no railroad may be authorized in that State without giving the Legislature opportunity to present their views thereon before the committee of Congress; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SISTERS OF MERCY.

Mr. PATTERSON, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 363, to incorporate the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was taken up, read a first and second time; and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PRUYN, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the Navy appropriation bill, and to refer them to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTHEASTERN DEFENSES.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I ask unanimous consent to report, from the select committee on the subject, a bill to provide for the defense of the northeastern frontier, in order that it may be made a special order for some future day.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I object.

JONAS A. HUGHSTON.

Mr. POMEROY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the personal representatives of Jonas A. Hughston; which was read a first and second time.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the personal representatives of Jonas A. Hughston $700 in full of all fees and emoluments to which he was or might have been entitled at the time of his death, by virtue of his office as marshal at Shanghai, China.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POMEROY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The SPEAKER stated the question in order to be the special order, being the reconstruction bill, on which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of the first session of this Congress, on the reference of the President's first annual message to the appropriate committee, so much as related to the condition and prospects of the rebellious States was referred with great propriety to a select committee of marked zeal and distinguished ability. We are now, in the last days of the last session of this Congress, discussing the result of their labors. The nature of a great part of the duties devolved upon the committee of which I am a member, in the last and present Congress, have led me to take an interest in the subject-matter of this reference; and the peculiar circumstances under which a bill for which I had myself voted, containing the main features of the one now under consideration, failed to become a law, notwithstanding it had passed both Houses of Congress, have led me to examine more fully the provisions of that bill and the one now before the House. And, sir, if that examination has failed to make clear to me the exact path of duty in this matter, it has not failed to reveal to me the great difficulties which this committee have been compelled to encounter. Sir, we are now considering, from a committee appointed in the manner I have indicated, a committee of known and distinguished zeal, ability, and industry in this matter, the fourth regular draft of a bill to accomplish the purpose for which they were appointed. And, sir, I understand that the committee have all ready, and there has been printed by the House, a fifth draft of this bill. I allude to this only as an illustration of the difficulties which I am conscious, from the slight examination I have been able to make of this matter, this committee have necessarily encountered in coming to a conclusion satisfactory to themselves in the accomplishment of the object they propose.

This is a bill not founded upon what is commonly called the war powers of this Government. It is no bill calculated to reinvigorate the Army, the Navy, or the Executive in a war which is being waged against the rebellion. The very first clause of the bill defines distinctly its limits. It provides for the appointment of a provisional governor who shall be charged with the "civil administration" of such State until a State government shall be recognized as thereafter provided. It therefore follows the Army. Its application is to the condition of the State in which the Army shall have left it. It is an attempt to gather up the "disjecta membra" of those States, the broken and torn fragments of those communities, and out of the chaos, as well as the ruins and debris that are left in the march of those armies, to create a State capable of discharging the functions, exercising the authority, and invoking the recognition of this Government, and of the people under which it lives. It is applicable, Mr. Speaker, to an extent of territory four times as large as the whole kingdom of Great Britain, which once dictated the law upon land as well as upon the sea, to the nations of the earth; to an extent of territory three times as large as all the territory of Great Britain and her hereditary foe, France, whose eagles have contended with her for supremacy in long wars for centuries that have gone by. It is applicable to what was once a people of eight millions, or thereabouts, of various habits and pursuits of life, living in all varieties of climate, and upon a land fertile in all that makes and constitutes it capable of making a great State and a great empire of itself. But a people not now, as once, in the pride and pomp and opulence which long years of peace had secured—but humbled, broken, and wasted, weak and distracted, without substance, without homes, without resources, bleeding with wounds their own mad hands have inflicted, and as yet but feebly comprehending in the dim light of returning reason either duty or the way to its discharge.

Sir, the questions involved in this bill are therefore of such vital importance, and so transcend in magnitude all minor considerations, that it would be criminal on my part to discuss its provisions in any other spirit than that of the utmost candor and sincerity. And, sir, if I am unable to give this bill my support, I shall not fail to recognize the ability, the zeal, and the patriotism in a common cause with me, which has prompted the several bills issuing from that committee, and their efforts to bring out of this chaos order and a substantial government in these States. The bill is divided into two distinct parts: first, that which endeavors to provide a present, temporary municipal government; and, second, that which seeks to prescribe the rule and method to which all efforts at any future period for the adoption of a constitution must conform. And, first, let us look at its provisions for a local government. What are the principles upon which this part of the bill is based? Not on the old theory of a colonial government, treating and subjecting them, according to that old policy of the colonies, to the will, the ownership, and the proprietorship, as well of the soil as the franchise; nor indeed on that later and more modern policy of treating each State in the condition of a Territory having power to form and frame their own government, with a supervisory power still residing here and retained by this Government; but, sir, the bill proceeds upon the supposition not only that there are States still existing, but that their old constitutions and laws are still in full force and operation; for, sir, the first duty imposed upon the provisional governor in these several administrations of government is this: "That until the United States shall have recognized a republican form of State government the provisional government of said States shall see that this act, and the laws of the United States, and the laws of the State in force when the State government was overthrown by the rebellion, are faithfully executed," saying and excepting the single provision touching the enforcement of the laws against slavery and the mode of trial and punishment of colored people. In all other matters and things this bill takes up the condition of those States, and declares it to be this: that they still exist within the Union, with their old boundaries and constitutions and laws still in force, but without officers to enforce them. And the proposition of the bill is to fill those offices by executive appointment here. This, sir, is the first attempt of the bill. It is for the Executive in Washington to supply that deficiency, namely, to fill the State offices in every one of those States, by the advice and with the consent, it may be, of the Senate of the United States. I read in this same section of the bill that which, the committee will permit me to say in all kindness, seems to be the most remarkable feature in the whole bill:

The President shall appoint such officers provided for by the laws of the State when its government was overthrown as he may find necessary to the civil administration of the State, all which officers shall be entitled to receive the fees and emoluments provided by the State laws for such officers.

Sir, two remarkable features are disclosed in this provision: first, that the officers of the State, no matter what provisions of law may exist for their election or appointment, are to be, nevertheless, appointed by the President of the United States, and just as many and just as few of them as he pleases. It may be the judge of the highest court of judicature in the State; or it may be the humblest road-master; it may be any one or all of the countless corps between them. Although the provisions of the State constitution and of the laws recognized by this bill to be in full force may provide for another method of appointment or election for these officials, from the highest judicial officer to the lowest constable in a parish, town, or county, the President may appoint just as many of them as he pleases, and from what part of the country he pleases. There is no provision in this bill that they shall even be residents of the State over which they are, by this bill, to administer its provisions and to execute the laws of the State. An army of officers, in one paragraph of four lines, is here created, subject to the sole authority and control of the President of the United States.

I see in a report to the confederate congress on the subject of offices and officers in the rebel States that there are thirteen thousand of them in one single State. What is the effect to be on the people over whom, from every quarter of this Union, broken-down politicians, men without place, foot-loose, are to be placed? Sir, it is a reproach to our Government at this hour that there are, about this capital and in the northern States, men who have been appointed to the judgeships of district and other courts of the rebel States and Territories, drawing quarterly the salaries of those offices, although they have never been able, from the hour they received their commissions to the present moment, to set foot in the States over whose courts they have been appointed. They could not go one rod into the State, positions in whose highest courts they have held for more than a year, without being hung on the first tree. It is a reproach to the Government that it should be so. I know nothing of the exigencies that could justify or defend this. But my friend [Mr. ASHLEY] has reported a bill here which authorizes an army of thousands of these office-holders to go into those States, with commissions from this capital in their pockets, to lord it over the poor, miserable inhabitants left behind the Army there. These rebel States may be thus converted into asylums for broken-down politicians. It is not for us to say that we have confidence in the proper exercise of this authority by the Chief Magistrate. I am looking at the provisions of this law just as if I had no confidence in him, although there is no member on this floor who has more confidence in him than I have. But the pressure upon him behind, with the door open to him before, has been already found too strong for resistance. If you pass this bill and make these provisions, an army of office-holders like the locusts of Egypt will press down upon those unoffending and unprotected inhabitants of the miserable, poverty-stricken, and rebellion-wrecked States.

And yet, sir, that is not quite so striking, after all, as the next provision of this bill; I read in the very next section the following:

And be it further enacted, That until the recognition of a State government, as aforesaid, the provisional governor shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, cause to be assessed, levied, and collected for the year 1865, and every year thereafter, the taxes provided by the laws of such State to be levied during the fiscal year preceding the overthrow of the State government thereof, in the manner prescribed by the laws of the State, as nearly as may be; and the officers appointed, as aforesaid, are vested with all powers of levying and collecting such taxes, by distress or sale, &c.

Sir, this bill authorizes and requires the provisional governor to levy the whole body of the taxes, in sum total assessed and provided by law, in the year next preceding the rebellion, on those people. And, sir, upon what sort of people? Upon a people, to begin with, that are beggars and seekers of alms at this day, dependent upon the charity, the noble and boundless charity of the North, to keep them from starvation. Their houses have been burned, their lands have been laid desolate, the sources of their industry have been destroyed or dried up. They are wanderers in their own land, homeless and houseless. And upon such a people, with all the new circumstances that rebellion and its effects, and the march of armies, fire, and plunder, have visited upon it, it is proposed to levy—yes, sir, levy—in this year of our Lord 1865, and every succeeding year thereafter, the precise sum which constituted the whole body of the taxes assessed upon them for all purposes whatever the last year before they went into rebellion. Sir, the condition of these people, upon whom this gross sum is to be assessed, for wretchedness and for inability to sustain even their lives, much less pay taxes, passes all description. I know nothing that more nearly comes up to a just description of that condition than Burke's glowing and inimitable description of the awful devastation which followed when Hyder Ali marched his conquering army over the Carnatic. Upon this people, as unlike in everything that constitutes a people capable of paying taxes, that people which they were when the taxes were originally imposed upon them as a beggar is unlike a prince, it is proposed nevertheless to impose and levy these taxes and call upon this innumerable army of imported office-holders to collect and wrench them as the last drop of life-blood from shriveled bodies. Sir, there is not an army, great as our Army is, that has power enough to accomplish that one single feat provided for in this bill, for the very plain reason that there is not money enough left in any one of these States outside the Government with which to pay that round sum for one single year. And yet, without stopping to inquire what these taxes were originally intended for, without stopping to inquire to what purposes they were devoted when raised, it is proposed, in four short lines, to levy them en masse upon these people; and this, sir, in aid of reconstruction. This wise, efficacious policy is resorted to in this bill to hasten on, I suppose, that other day mentioned in it, when a majority of these people, molded by this process, won by its benignity "shall voluntarily take the oath of allegiance."

Now, sir, have my friends ever looked into the statutes of any of these States to see what those taxes were for, and on whom assessed; or have they looked into the code of any one of those States to ascertain what is the nature of those State laws which they impose it upon the provisional governor faithfully to execute? There is not a larger heart in this House or in the country than that of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] who reported this bill, or than those of the whole committee. I accord to them a desire to accomplish the same final end that I hope I am striving for myself in this matter, but I tell them that they are calling upon us by this bill to sanction all the black codes of those States, save only that part which holds men in bondage, and that they let enforce itself.

Let me read you a single provision of law which my friends impose it upon their provisional governors to see faithfully executed:

"If any free person of color or slave shall keep any school or other place of instruction for teaching any slave or free person of color to read or write, such free person of color or slave shall be liable to the same fine, imprisonment, and corporeal punishment as are by this act imposed and inflicted on free persons of color and slaves for teaching slaves to read and write."

That extends to all men made free either by that great and glorious proclamation of the President, or that which transcends it and all other provisions, the amendment to the Constitution. In all the coming time that shall exist between the passage of this bill and the time when these poor creatures shall emerge from their wretched and helpless condition under it, he who shall teach one of these poor freedmen the first rudiments of knowledge and direct the first ray of divine light so that it shall shine in upon his soul, shall be flogged, and imprisoned in the discretion of the judge who presides over the court.

Sir, I read from another that free colored men, not natives, residing in the State shall pay annually a tax of fifty dollars for the privilege of remaining and living in the State. This is one of the taxes specially and specifically revived and put in force to be collected from this poor and miserable race.

Sir, there was a provision, there is now upon the statute-books of one of those States a provision, under which that State was in the habit of taking citizens of Massachusetts and of other States, as they came within the lines of that State, though guaranteed by the Constitution "all privileges of citizens in the several States," and incarcerating them in jail. That statute is still to be enforced under the provisions of this bill. There was sent down there not many years ago by the Governor of Massachusetts a venerable statesman to go into the district court of the United States, over which there had presided in that very State a man who has pronounced their own law in this regard unconstitutional, and peaceably and quietly, in the discharge of professional duty in a cause there pending, to enter an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is well known to the country that that venerable man was driven from the State and compelled to seek safety and life in flight. That State thereafter passed a law, which still stands upon the statute-book of that State, and which this committee propose by this bill to make it the duty of the provisional governor of that State "faithfully to execute," which provides that if any man repeats this offense and comes into the State to enter an appeal in her courts in behalf of one of these oppressed people, citizens though they may be of his own State, he shall, upon conviction, be imprisoned, in the discretion of the judge who presides over the court, for life or for any number of years, provided it does not fall below five years.

In the solicitude of this committee to provide for the enforcement of these laws, the omissions of this bill are after all quite as remarkable as its inhibitions and directions. The bill contemplates an indefinite duration of the government and state of things established by it. And such are its conditions that it must be long years, it may be a generation, before some of the States can possibly relieve themselves from its operations, yet there is no provision for the new state of things now existing there. There is no attempt at any adaptation of these laws to the new state of things consequent upon the rebellion, and consequent upon our constitutional action here. Not only is there no provision for the new wants and necessities of this wasted and wretched people who have been involved in the rebellion, but for that other people who have now passed into freedom by our legislation, and by the military consequences of this rebellion, who are now without food, without subsistence, without knowledge, and without opportunity to support and maintain themselves; yes, sir, without homes, literally without where to lay their heads. Although this professes to be a constitutional application of the power of the Government to these people, and by its own provision to be continued in force indefinitely, yet I fail to find in it a recognition of the fact that there are three million of these people who come under this bill; their existence even is ignored in the bill. There is no provision for schools; no provision for a poor-house, even; no provision for their protection; no provision for attempting to teach them the arts of civilization, for kindling in them hope, holding up before them incentives to industry or securing them its reward. Under the operations of this bill they are to be the objects of free plunder; they are to go forth to be hunted, despoiled, and persecuted outcasts in the land.

I have thus far considered one of the two branches into which this bill is divided—that which proposes to establish over them a present system of government. How long does this bill propose to continue that system over them? In the first place, just so long as the provisional governor shall see fit to have it maintained. It is left by this bill itself discretionary with the provisional governor himself to determine when he will institute the first initiatory steps of measures calculated to bring out of this state of things a new form of government. The bill says that when the people of any State "shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience" this provisional governor shall institute steps for a State government, making no provision except his own opinion for determining this point. Before he will institute the first step, it is in his discretion to say whether the people "shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience." With his place and the places of the whole army of office-holders under him at stake, it will not be soon, I think, were there no other obstacle in the way; it will be at no immediate period that this governor will come to the conclusion that the people have been sufficiently subdued for him to take the initiatory steps to form a State government.

But there is another limitation upon the proceeding. Even if the provisional governor should come to be willing, in the course of events, to take these initiatory steps, this bill goes on to say that those proceedings shall depend upon another question, that is, whether a majority of the people in the State have of their own choice signified their loyalty by taking the oath of allegiance. Under this bill, it does not depend upon the wish of the loyal people to have a government of their own; it depends upon the wish of the disloyal people. So long as the disloyal people can keep a majority on their side, they can dictate what sort of a government they shall have. In the early part of this rebellion there was no uncertainty upon this side of the House. It was held that upon the loyal people, and upon the loyal people alone, were to be reposed the functions of government; that they were to hold the elective franchise; they to determine the character of the government; and that rebels were only to be "counted" that we might know what force may be necessary for their subjection. But, sir, under the administration of these men—this army of foreign officers, from him who sits in the high court of judicature, passing upon the rights of the people, down to the most insignificant official—how long, under such instruction as that, I submit to my distinguished friend, will it be before that majority are won back to signify their desire to exchange this form of government which he imposes for one of their own making?

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the people of Louisiana have not, under the rule of General Banks, (whom the gentleman designates as a foreigner,) organized a State government which he has reported in favor of recognizing?

Mr. DAWES. I will answer the gentleman before I get through. That question falls within the line of remark which I propose to pursue.

The bill proposes, first, to introduce these foreign elements to constitute temporarily—not permanently, I know—the government, in which this majority shall have no voice; and this foreign administration are to administer laws which were made for another state of things—old, effete, superseded by the march of armies and events—without the slightest provision in this bill for their amendment, amelioration, or adaptation to the new state of things. I submit, sir, that such a government, instead of winning back the loyalty of the people there, will create alienation and heart-burnings, from the hour of its institution till the hour when it shall pass away. It ignores entirely that great element of American character which has had its play, and has never been suppressed from the day when one little colony, struggling for the right of self-government, entered James river, and another instituted a government under Calvert in Maryland, free from the outset, and when still another colony made a written compact of government upon the deck of the Mayflower. From that day onward this principle has been exercised by every community and every class in this land till it appears in the fastnesses of the Rocky mountains among the miners. Wherever a band of men have come together in this country the first and foremost thing is for them to make, themselves, and adopt, the regulations by which they are to be governed. You can no more suppress it than you can wipe out the instinct of liberty. The American people will have the right to shape and alter for themselves the rules by which they are governed.

This bill ignores that principle. It does not provide for any process by which there shall be any modification or repeal of a single law in any one of those States as it stood in 1861 when the rebellion broke out. Horace Maynard, a man coming up from among those people, knowing them better than we can know them, suffering with them and sacrificing for them, told me, with the first draft of this bill in his hand, that if the provision requiring the loyal men to be subject to the disloyal majority should be enacted, the child was not born in Tennessee who would see a loyal government instituted there. The only wise policy, it seems to me, is to establish a government among the loyal. Weak it may be at first, inefficient it may be at first; not working with entire smoothness and without friction, it may be, at first, but the work of their own hands, to be modified and molded and perfected as they become more stable and more firm under the benign influence of that principle by which men are drawn, not driven.

I speak now of one of two classes into which I always divide the people engaged in this rebellion—that class who desire reconciliation, and that class who deserve to be hanged. With the latter I have nothing now to do. This bill does not propose to deal with them. Our hope rests upon that which I trust and believe is the larger, certainly a more healthy and more hopeful class—those who desire to be reconciled. "It is by the establishment of such a government," said Mr. Maynard to me, "among my people that those wanderers driven out from the protection of their government, can witness again its benign influence, and feel that on this side of the line there is peace and security and justice, and on that side of the line war and destruction." Under this system there will gradually grow up a loyal State government—weak, as I have said, it may be at first, but having the true elements of a State—among a people capable of self-government, and in a land capable of making a noble and an influential State.

I therefore, sir, am quite as much opposed to that other provision of the bill which gives over every loyal man to the mercy of the aggregate majority of disloyal men.

Sir, there is also a provision in this bill to prescribe a particular method, a fixed iron rule, by conformity to which alone out of this chaos and anarchy may be made a loyal government; and to the provisions in this bill for that purpose I desire for one moment to call the attention of the House.

I have assumed all along that there is ample authority in the Constitution for these provisions; or rather, sir, I have omitted to discuss the question whether there is authority; and I would desire to get along, if it were possible, without discussing that question at all, for there are objections, assuming the authority of the Constitution for these provisions is ample enough—though I must say, in passing, that I do not know where they are found—there are objections which to my mind seem to be insurmountable against laying down any rule and saying in this way, or in any other way alone, shall these people rise from the ashes of their old State government into the full condition of a new and living State government. It goes upon the assumption that there is no power in these people except what we give them by the legislation of the Federal Government here to establish a State government there. Sir, I deny that. I am not able to admit that it is in the power of the Federal Government to give them that authority; but this is certain, that they do not need it. And my learned friends in this bill have conceded that question to me, for in the last section of the bill they have themselves recognized the State government formed in Louisiana and the one in Arkansas, neither of them upon the principle or in pursuance of the requirements of this bill or any power derived from Congress, and neither of them upon the plan of the other.

Why, sir, it is in the people, and in the people alone, that this authority exists to form its organic law, subject solely to another provision which the people, in coming under the Constitution of the United States surrendered to us here, "provided that it be republican in form." If republican in form, the character of their organic law, the method by which they are to institute and make it their organic law rests with them, and them alone. The thing has been illustrated in Congress. Territories have been made into States and admitted into the Union without enabling acts, although we have the power to make an enabling act. They came with constitutions which, in the opinion of Congress, were republican in form, and which received the approbation of Congress. The State of Rhode Island, out of that very rebellion against her charter granted by King Charles to Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, brought over from England bodily two hundred years ago, without any provision for its annulment, or without any prescription by which a new constitution was to be framed; the State of Rhode Island, in voluntary convention—that is, voluntary so far as any authority from the organic law was concerned—met and drafted a new constitution of government, and it was adopted and recognized. The people of Massachusetts, although having in their constitution prescribed the method for its amendment, in the exercise of their inherent and inalienable power, subject only to this provision here at the central Government that it should be republican in form, met in convention, and in dereliction of the very provision of her constitution, made a new one. The pretense that it was unconstitutional lived but a little while in Massachusetts. The winds blew it away. No man has been able to stand up there and say that the people of Massachusetts could not alter their organic act when and how they pleased, subject to this restriction.

And, sir, so these people in these several States, whenever they shall come to understand, when the scales shall fall from their eyes and they shall see, can form a new framework of government, republican in form, and which loyal, not loyal and disloyal people, shall acquiesce in and adopt.

My friend [Mr. ASHLEY] inquires of me if I have not recognized a constitution adopted in Louisiana, under the guidance of General Banks, a foreigner to the people there. I answer yes, because the loyal people of that State made it, adopted it, acquiesced in it, are building up a State under it, winning back to loyalty and allegiance and cooperation the people of the State under it. Now, I ask him if, while he attempts in this bill to lay down an iron rule for all the other States in rebellion, he does not in this very bill make an exception in favor of Louisiana, and himself recognize this very government so formed under General Banks?

He thinks it is sufficiently republican in form if it has in it this one further element, that a majority of the disloyal men are willing to have it. That is all he asks. And then he proceeds in a subsequent part of the same section and takes up a constitution adopted in Arkansas upon an entirely different principle from that—a constitution originating in county organizations, which form one grand aggregate of convictions and result in that constitution. Sir, he says that such a constitution is sufficiently legal in form, sufficiently republican in essence, and he is willing to adopt it. And therefore he agrees with me that no form of law is necessary—no form either prescribed before or followed by them as their law. He says that as the people upon the Mayflower, as the people under Calvert in Maryland, as the colonies on the James river, as the miners in the fastnesses of the Sierra Nevada, got together and made laws that shall govern them and be binding upon them, so long as they are not in conflict with the higher allegiance to which they all subscribed, so may these people, and that that is sufficient, and all that is required.

My friend wanted to know if the Louisiana convention and constitution were not the result of the interference of those very foreigners whose presence there I have deprecated. I admit, sir, that they were set on foot by a man who had no citizenship or residence in Louisiana. But that constitution did not and does not now derive its authority from any exercise of power upon his part; and my friend, in his bill, does not place its recognition upon any such ground. It has just the same authority and would have had the same had Mr. Thomas J. Durant instituted these proceedings and the people had acquiesced in them, and out of them the loyal people of that State, in the absence of any State government, had formed one of their own.

But, sir, this bill proposes, further provides, that until a majority of the people of these two States, Louisiana and Arkansas, shall be found by an enumeration and census, not to be loyal, but simply to have taken the oath, truly this act and all its provisions shall be in full force and effect there.

The language of the bill is, "and till that time those States shall be subject to this law." That is, sir, a "provisional governor," appointed by the President, is to be sent down to displace Governor Hahn, who was elected by the loyal voters of Louisiana, and Governor Murphy, who has in like manner been elected by the loyal voters of Arkansas, and who have each been in the full exercise of the functions of Governor with the acquiescence of all good citizens for a year; displace all the State officers so elected in each of those States, and set up in their places presidential appointees, strangers, exercising the duties of their office over a strange people; displacing judges now in Arkansas, in every county but one holding the regular terms of courts; and in both those States—a State government achieving a success truly wonderful, surrounded as they are with difficulties, beset as they, like us here, are with vain and impracticable theories—order is being restored, loyalty is being developed, life and property secured, political rights protected. I am not willing, for one, to drive back, by the passage of this bill, these people from this attained standpoint and vantage-ground into the personal bickerings, heart-burnings, discontent, and anarchy surely consequent upon the attempt to enforce this act upon the people of those States. The gentlemen all along in their bill, as I have said, recognize the principle, and build their bill upon it—a mistaken view, as I think—that there shall be no government there until all the people, or a majority of them, have of their own accord come back into the Union. I say the bill goes upon what seems to me to be a mistaken policy—that there must not be any government there until a majority of all the people have of their own accord, and without any foreign influence of government or institutions, or any winning process whatever, come back and signified their desire for such a government.

My idea is that the moment you can establish a government there, that the moment the people of those States have got so far back in their allegiance that if let alone they can maintain themselves, if the enemy from without can be kept off, if they are strong enough, united enough, harmonious enough among themselves to establish a government, it seems to me the best policy is to let them do it. I tell you they must do it sooner or later. It must be their own work, begun in weakness, molded by time, protected by parental care of the central Government, benign, patient, hopeful in its exercise.

And this leads me to that provision of the bill which, under specious terms of guarantying to those States a republican form of government, dictates to them what those essential elements shall be. They are all well enough in themselves, some of them fundamental to a republican government. But, sir, it dictates, does not "guaranty;" and if we can dictate one provision we can dictate another, and to dictate a republican form of government is a contradiction in terms. Let us not be deceived into a fatal doctrine by the specious character in which it comes to us.

Mr. KELLEY. Before the gentleman proceeds further, I desire to ask him whether, within his knowledge, the delegates who framed that constitution represented a majority of the territory and people of that State. I will further, with the permission of the gentleman, ask him whether the colored creole population in Louisiana, the descendants of those whose citizenship was specially guarantied by the provisions of the treaty of 1803, are not by this constitution excluded from citizenship, involving the bad faith of the country to its treaty stipulations.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the first question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he shall have whatever testimony I can give him on that subject. He desires to know whether the constitution that has been adopted in Louisiana was the result of the action of a majority of the people of the State, or represents the greater part of the territory of Louisiana. By the census of 1860, the parish of Orleans contains within a fraction of a majority of all the white people of the State of Louisiana. The territory which participated in the adoption of this constitution embraces not only that parish, but some dozen other parishes along the Mississippi river and included between the Amite on the right and the Teche on the left, embracing nearly all the fertile river bottoms of the State excepting the Red river country; but what portion of the white population of that State are actually embraced within those limits we have no means of telling, for the reason that although the census shows that a large majority of the white people of the State were within those lines in 1869, and a much larger majority of the blacks, yet their condition now and in 1860 is so widely different that no reliance can be placed on any such basis as that.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to ask a question which, perhaps, will be answered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will permit him.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection.

Mr. SMITH. It is right on this point—

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Kentucky will allow me to put one other question—

Mr. DAWES. Let me go on. My own opinion, and all the evidence I can get, is that quite a large majority of the white and of the black population of the State of Louisiana is embraced within the limits of our lines; and that all that portion of the territory lying outside of our lines is the sparsely settled portion, the desert portion, the swamp portion. I have no doubt myself, and I think the evidence that comes to us shows, that a large majority of the white population of the State are within our lines. That does not, however, quite answer the gentleman's question, which is, whether these people acquiesced in the formation of this State government.

Mr. KELLEY. I referred to that portion of the people whose civil and political rights were guaranteed by the treaty of 1803.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose the gentleman means the colored creoles.

Mr. KELLEY. I do.

Mr. DAWES. I do not understand that there is anything in the new constitution of the State to deprive the creole of his rights. It leaves the question as to whether he shall be entitled to the right of suffrage to the Legislature to dispose of. But I do not consider that as depriving him of his rights. If that were so, I suppose that every female in the State of Louisiana is deprived of her political rights by the fact that no right of voting is guaranteed to her. I know of nothing else that would lead to the gentleman's inquiry, and I presume his inquiry covers that ground. There is no feature of the law of the State of Massachusetts which I admire more than that which provides that no distinction shall be made on any other foundation than that of character and intelligence. I wish it were so everywhere. I hope to see the time when it shall be so in Louisiana. If it were so there to-day I should greatly rejoice in it. Whether it shall be so depends upon the wisdom of our legislation on this very bill, in a great measure; for, if we leave this people to manipulate and form their own State government, by that means sooner than by any other will they come out of their troubles and constitute a form of government in harmony with those ideas of equality which are the glory as well as the fundamental basis of the Republic.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me one moment further?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not understood the gentleman to deny that a majority of the people of Louisiana are outside of the parishes represented in the convention that framed this constitution, though he asserts that a majority of the rich bottom-lands are within the lines. The best information I have been able to obtain is that only about two fifths of the white population of the State were within these lines and three fifths outside of them, and that a very large majority of the colored population were within them. I would now inquire of the gentleman whether the territory outside of these lines is not to-day in the armed occupation of a belligerent power?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman is mistaken as to the facts. I wish, however, before closing, to say a word to the gentleman from Pennsylvania touching the point which he has raised in relation to the right of suffrage of the freedmen of color in Louisiana. I have stated my own opinions and my own views. I cannot, however, fail to recognize a republican government in Louisiana that does not quite come up to my standard any more than I can fail to recognize a republican form of government in your own State of Indiana, Mr. Speaker, where colored people are not permitted to vote at all; or in Pennsylvania, which the gentleman so much honors in his representation here upon this floor, but which denies to the colored man the right to vote. I would just as soon institute measures here to declare that the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania is not republican in form, inasmuch as it does not permit all persons of color to vote, as I would put a bar upon the people of Louisiana in the formation of their constitution because they do not make the right of suffrage as universal as they do in my own State of Massachusetts, which I am happy to know my friend has taken as his example in this regard.

Mr. KELLEY. I think the gentleman fails to perceive the point which I made, which is whether they have not made a constitution which violates the express stipulations of the treaty of 1803, by which that territory was ceded to us, and excluded the descendants of a large portion of the then population, whose political rights were expressly guaranteed by the terms of that treaty.

Mr. DAWES. With all due deference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I do not propose to involve the discussion of this question, in which is wrapped up the destiny of these great States, and upon which I believe the fate of the nation in a great measure depends, in any new construction of the treaty of 1803, which the people of Louisiana and the people of the whole United States have failed to perceive the necessity of till this hour. And when I say that, I admit to the gentleman the full force and power of all his reasoning upon the right of every man capable of self-government to exercise the privileges of citizenship.

Mr. MALLORY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question about a matter which I have not heard him touch upon in his discussion to-day. It is this, whether the constitution of Louisiana, which it is claimed by the gentleman now exists, and under the provisions of which Representatives have been elected to this Congress, was made in pursuance of the provisions of the previous constitution.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I had devoted some little time to a feeble attempt to show that the people of a State had the capacity to make a new constitution, even if the method that they pursued in making that constitution did not conform to any previous existing law of the State, and I instanced the State of Rhode Island, I instanced the State of Massachusetts, I instanced repeated cases in the Territories of the United States of the people voluntarily coming together, and in convention, or by whatever term you have a mind to call it, making an organic form of government, and bringing it here to receive the recognition and sanction of the Government; and therefore I did not stop to inquire whether this constitution conformed to a previous provision existing in the old constitution of Louisiana, for although the bill itself recognizes that constitution to be in full force, and all laws made in pursuance of it excepting laws holding men in bondage, I must say for myself that if out of the chaos of this rebellion, and out of the upturning and upheaving of the very elements of society, there can be found any considerable number of loyal men so united and harmonious in their action as to be able to form a framework of organic government, republican in form, and that shall receive the acquiescence of the loyal men of that people over which it is to be enforced, and they have also strength and power enough within themselves to suppress domestic violence if left to themselves, just such a State we should open our arms to and welcome back with rejoicing and clapping of hands.

Mr. MALLORY. Would not the gentleman designate the movements to which he has called our attention revolutionary movements in those States?

Mr. DAWES. I call them the great and grand and glorious results of a revolution; not the revolution itself, which was begun in injustice and in treason, but which, under the guidance of a Power which holds the issues of nations as well as individuals in its hands, is working out a glorious deliverance of the land into a more perfect and glorious republican form of government.

I have trespassed upon the indulgence of the House too much. My only purpose is to impress upon this House the very conclusion which finds sanction in the last section of this bill, namely, that no form can be prescribed, no law laid down here, no unbending iron rule fixed by the central Government, for the governing of that people, or prescribing the method in which they shall make their organic law. Each of them shall work out that problem for itself and in its own way. That form and system which is best adapted to Louisiana and Arkansas is quite different from that which is ultimately to be adopted in South Carolina and Georgia. These are a people unlike in their habits and pursuits, in their notions, in their loyalty or disloyalty, whichever it may be. In each one of these States the condition of things and feelings is unique, and finds no counterpart in any other. In the States more particularly under consideration the people are struggling to rise from chaos into the form of republican organic law. The others to which I have alluded are still wandering in the wilderness of treason and rebellion, and rolling as a sweet morsel under their tongue the sin which has brought all this calamity upon us.

What extreme medicine shall bring them back to their right minds—what sort of constitutional measures or further military treatment shall be found necessary to bring them back from treason, and to bring out from among them a true and loyal people, it is as unnecessary as it would be difficult or impossible to tell in this discussion. Time must furnish the great solution of all these embarrassing questions. Time has already proved the best solvent of questions which have seemed to us incapable of solution. No rule which we may here attempt to adopt, no rule we have ever adopted, has been or will be found adapted to the exigencies of particular cases. As they have arisen they have found their own solution; and whenever any one of these States comes up here, presenting a constitution republican in form, the workmanship of the loyal men of the State, and which is generally acquiesced in by them, and they have power enough within themselves to maintain it against all domestic violence, then I submit that in whatever form, by joint resolution, or by the admission of members into either branch of Congress, may seem best to this House or to the other, or to both Houses together, I care not; the result is one and the same. To me it is sufficient to present this evidence, and I am ready to welcome them back into the sisterhood and full communion of the States.

Therefore I hope that this bill, which attempts to prescribe an iron, unbending rule for all these States, will fail to become a law.

EVACUATION OF CHARLESTON.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask that the following dispatch, just received from the War Department, be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
February 20, 1865—2.45 p. m.

SIR: The inclosed telegram from General Grant, announcing the evacuation of Charleston, has been received by this Department.

Your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. R. C. SCHENCK, Chairman Military Committee.

[From City Point, February 20, 12.30 p. m.]

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

The following dispatch just received.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant General.

The Richmond Examiner of to-day, just received, says Charleston was evacuated on Tuesday last.

G. WEITZEL,
Major General.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with much satisfaction to the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and I congratulate this House and the country that at last we hear the language of conciliation in that quarter. When we consider the party to which he belongs, the Administration which he sustains, and the section of country that he represents, it is with no little surprise that I hear that gentleman refer to our southern enemies as "a great people," and use the language of kindness, respect, and conciliation toward them.

Sir, from that side of the House thus far we have heard little but of subjugation, devastation, and of annihilation when speaking of the enemy. Judging from the tenor and temper of the majority, the inference was that that people had no rights, and were entitled to no mercy, no quarter, not even to the respect due to humanity.

Hence I say that I have listened with pleasure to the gentleman; and I congratulate this House and the country that at last there appears to be a disposition toward a more conciliatory sentiment in this House. This gives me more hope for my country, considering the class of men that gentleman represents, than anything that has transpired recently.

Sir, if I could be surprised at anything in this Congress, or at any report from any committee of this House, it would be at the introduction of a measure like this; and were I disposed to depart from my rule to treat every question with respect and courtesy, I should pronounce this an infamous measure, unconstitutional and unpatriotic, the emanation of the worst species of fanaticism. It is a bill, according to its title, "to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government." It was reported originally by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY], who, as if himself ashamed of the child he had produced, has subsequently submitted two modifications of the original proposition, while other members of the special committee of which he is chairman have presented three more, making in all five distinct measures now before the House, all proposing "to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government." Upon the assumption that the States in rebellion have not republican forms of government, this bill proposes to make for those States a government which it calls republican. And, sir, it is claimed that the power to do this is found in the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which provides that—

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

Now, sir, in the discussion of this proposition it is necessary to consider first what is a republican form of government. I presume there will be no difference on this question. A republican form of government is that form which is distinguished from the imperial or monarchical or more absolute; it is in short the mode selected and adopted by the framers of the General Government, and its essence lies in self-government, through the representative principle. It is the right of the people to govern themselves. Our form combines the democratic feature with sufficient centralization to give vigor of execution. Republicanism does not lie altogether in forms, nor can it be imparted. It is a government made, regulated, controlled, and to be modified only by the people themselves. No other power can confer it. Republicanism in this country, as I understand it, means the right of the people themselves to construct their own Government; and when a central power, or any other power than the people themselves, attempts to make a government for a community, it is a usurpation, however free in theory. The States and the people thereof are entitled, under our system, to make their own forms of government.

Now, sir, what is the character of the State governments of those States now in rebellion for which this bill proposes to provide governments? Is there any difference in the form of the governments of those States from what they were five or six years ago? Do not the people of those States elect representatives to a State Legislature? Does not that Legislature make the local laws of the State? Have they not State Executives elected by the people? So far as the form of government is concerned, there is not, in my judgment, the least change to justify us in dictating a government for them. If they are not now republican they were not so at the adoption of the constitution or at any time before the rebellion.

But it is alleged that by passing ordinances of secession and armed resistance to the Government these States have lost this right. How can this be? The offense of the southern people is treason. The Constitution declares treason a crime, and makes it a punishable offense. It is not provided that treason shall be punished by a forfeiture of the rights which the people of a State have to regulate their own domestic affairs. It is the offense of an individual, not of a State. While you may deprive the former of civil rights after trial and conviction you cannot certainly by legislation of this kind take from a sovereign State its inherent prerogatives of independence over any question or subject not delegated to the Federal authority.

Again, the duty imposed upon the General Government to "guaranty" a republican form of government to a State cannot be construed to mean that it conveys the power to create a government, or to do that which this bill provided by superintending or directing the manner of doing it.

The Constitution provides that we shall guaranty or see that their governments are republican in form, and shall protect each of them against invasion. The Government of the United States shall protect these States from invasion and shall protect the right of these States to make their own government. It is under this provision of the Constitution that it is sought to defend this measure and to perpetrate an outrage on the constitutional rights of the people and States which, though now in rebellion, will not be so when this bill, if it becomes a law, shall be operative.

If completed, it will be the grossest and most wicked usurpation that any central power has ever attempted to exercise over any body of people claiming to be free.

But, sir, admitting that we have the right contended for, do we by this bill make a republican form of government? Is it republican for the President of the United States to appoint a provisional governor over a State, with the power that it is proposed to confer? Is it republican, as this bill provides, that nearly the whole population of the rebellious States, though assenting to the Constitution, laws, and authority of the United States, shall be disfranchised in the making of their own local form of State government, for Congress to declare for them who shall vote and who shall not, and under what circumstances the resident populations of those States shall have any civil rights whatever? What are the powers proposed to be conferred on the President? He appoints for each State in rebellion a governor, who makes all the regulations for the calling of a State convention; designates the voters; fixes at pleasure the plan for holding conventions; superintends all the preliminary arrangements for the election of delegates; virtually declares who shall vote; is to be the custodian of the enrollment of voters, and thus is empowered to make the basis upon which rests the least semblance of popular rights. That basis is composed of the Army and the followers of the Army. Every person in the Army, every person in a military capacity connected with the Army, is authorized to vote at the election.

It is also provided that a certain class who shall take an oath ostensibly to support the Constitution, but really to subvert the Constitution, shall vote. It is provided that those two classes shall constitute the voting population of that State. The governor holds the enrollment himself. He then orders the election of delegates to the State convention, and he orders that convention to assemble whenever and wherever he pleases. He has the power to change the place of its sitting at pleasure. He receives the names of persons to compose this convention; and it is no stretch of power for him to declare in advance who shall be members of the convention, and who shall not be. And when the convention has assembled he is himself to preside over it. He calls it to order and he then administers an oath to each delegate, an oath prescribed by the bill itself. The delegate is made to swear that he has not done certain things, and that he will not do certain things. Assuming that he gets together some kind of representative body representing the people of that State, the constitution which they make falls under the provisions of this act. It is provided, for instance, that they shall vote for the amendment to the Constitution of the United States which Congress recommended to the States the other day. They are obliged to swear that they will pass that amendment to the Constitution of the United States. And if any proceedings of the convention displease this provisional governor, the tool and instrument of the President, he can dissolve the convention at pleasure and send them home.

This, sir, is the republican government which it is proposed to give to the people of these States. This is the substitute which you propose to give to the States in rebellion for that form of government which they, acting under the Constitution of the United States, have seen proper to adopt.

Mr. SMITH. I would ask the gentleman from New York whether he considers that, when a State now in rebellion went into rebellion, called a State convention by which its original constitution was changed and made to conform to the constitution of the so-called confederate states, there is any fundamental law binding those people to the Government of the United States? I ask whether it does not require some action on the part of the people to change that law which has been introduced by the rebellion so as to make it conform to the laws of the United States.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure. I hold that it is the sovereign right of the people of every State to meet together in convention and make any change or modification of their constitution, or even of their form of government, provided it is republican; and that so long as the republican form shall be preserved, and so long as it recognizes, as in my judgment it is its duty to recognize, the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance and not in contravention thereof, just so long the sovereignty resides there and nowhere else. I do not justify the so-called acts of secession or ordinances of secession passed by the southern States. In my judgment they have placed themselves criminally in the wrong. "Grievously have they erred, and grievously have they answered for it." But because they have done wrong, because they have committed an error, because they have perpetrated an outrage, shall we do the same? Shall we follow their example? Shall we subvert the Constitution because they have disregarded it?

The Constitution itself answers the gentleman from Kentucky. If they have been guilty of treason the Constitution provides the manner and mode of punishing treason. And now, sir, if at this time, notwithstanding their having passed an ordinance of secession, notwithstanding their rebellion, if you please, against the Federal Government, if these people, the very same people of either of these sovereign States, see proper to meet and amend their constitution and elect Senators and Representatives to this or the next Congress, there is no power here to prevent their coming back again. I hold that the Congress of the United States have no power to make conditions upon which a State shall resume its proper position in this Government; and were any of these States today to lay down their arms and recognize the Federal laws and Constitution and elect Representatives to Congress, I would like to see the power that would constitutionally and legally prevent them from coming into the Union.

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman's "if" comes in rather apropos. If the rebellious portion of either of these States should lay down their arms and ask forgiveness on the part of the United States, I have no doubt that forgiveness would be granted, save, perhaps, the punishment of some of the leaders in these great transactions. It has been admitted, and it is true, that notwithstanding the rebellious portions of these States have gone into this rebellion, and formed new constitutions, and enacted new laws, not in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, yet there has been left to each one of those States a loyal population who love the country and Constitution, and who obey the laws. Now, the proper custodian of the rights and interests of those people is the Chief Executive of the United States. The question I wish the gentleman to answer is, how we are to get at a reorganization of those States except through the instrumentality of the Executive, who shall prescribe means through the laws of Congress for that thing of establishing a provisional government until these loyal people can do it themselves.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I deny the premises of the gentleman. I deny that the President of the United States is the custodian of the interests, of the opinions, of the rights of any portion of the States.

Mr. SMITH. Does not the Constitution require that the Chief Executive shall see that the laws of the United States are executed in all parts of the country?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Yes, sir; and the Chief Executive of the United States is to-day seeing that those laws are executed by force of arms; and that is the exercise of the executive power. But when, in derogation of his constitutional power he interferes with civil rights, the rights of election, the rights of the people, acting in their peaceful and sovereign capacity, to make their own constitution and laws, subject to the Constitution of the United States, he is guilty of usurpation. The Constitution imposes upon the President certain executive duties, and he is prosecuting this war to-day simply as an executive authority, and he does it to put down an armed rebellion. In our Government there can be nothing like a civil rebellion, and when this rebellion ceases, either as the result of force of arms or by submission on the other side, the executive power over that people ceases, and his armies must be withdrawn. The only pretext for these armies and for the exercise of this military power, is the military resistance on the other side, and the moment that resistance is withdrawn the people resume their civil capacity, and all their civil rights are returned to them. Of course the penalty for treason remains punishable by law. All that we demand of them is that they shall become again members of our Government; that they shall respect our Constitution; that they shall recognize our laws and the authority of our Government.

Sir, as I said before, these States are in the Union necessarily, and there is no power here, no power under any act you can pass, to say upon what conditions they can come in, because if they come in at all they must come in on an equal footing with any other State of the Union, or else this is not a republican form of government. Therefore it is I contend that any attempt to impose conditions is absurd. In the first place, the power to do so does not exist; and in the second place, the necessity for doing so cannot exist if these States in rebellion submit to the Constitution and the Government and laws of the United States. If they have committed a crime, what crime? The crime of treason, and the Constitution itself declares what constitutes treason, and the mode and manner of its punishment.

Mr. SMITH. Upon the reorganization of the State of Mississippi, according to the idea of the gentleman from New York, it may come back when it pleases and as it pleases; and nothing here can be done to designate the terms upon which it may come back. Now, if these people by laying down their arms can elect Jefferson Davis as a member to the United States Senate, does the gentleman from New York believe it would be proper to allow him to take his seat in the Senate and participate in the legislation of this country?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The Constitution of the United States leaves the Senate, as well as the House, to determine the qualifications of its own members. And I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he would allow it, or disallow it, if he were a member of the Senate?

Mr. SMITH. I answer very emphatically that I would not allow it, but that I would hang him without an "if" or an "and."

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Sir, we cannot disqualify in advance any man from becoming a member of Congress. Except by the act of the House itself judging of the case and of the qualifications can a constituency be disfranchised. If the Legislature of Mississippi elected Jefferson Davis a Senator of the United States, it would be for the Senate itself to determine whether he was a qualified member of that body.

If he has been guilty of a crime, that is an act punishable by law, and it would be a proper question doubtless for the Senate itself to take into consideration whether they would give him his seat or whether they would not.

But, Mr. Speaker, I assume that the author of this bill and every member of this House is earnest in the desire of securing a reunion of our Government. I am not prepared to charge any man here with an intention and design of disunion. Therefore it is that looking to restoration, looking to union, looking to that great result that we all so much desire, that these States shall again be within the Union, recognizing our Constitution, I submit, in view of the military results of which we are continually hearing, and in view of the successes of our armies, whether it is wise, whether it is politic, whether it is magnanimous, for this great people to add insult upon insult, oppression upon oppression, and to do that which will itself render it impossible for that people to live in any kind of fraternal concord with us, and, as now attempted, in a condition of servitude and dependence?

I was gratified, therefore, to-day to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] say kindly of these people that it is our duty to do that which will restore them again to us, to bring them back with all their rights within the Union, which are just as sacred to them as ours are sacred to us.

Sir, a month ago when this subject was under discussion the aspect of public affairs was very different from what it is now. A month ago there had been no conference looking to reunion. Since that period there has been a conference, and although that conference has failed, yet, in my judgment, there was in it sufficient to give every lover of his country hope that without much further bloodshed these people may see the necessity and propriety of coming back to their allegiance to the Government. Do not cut off the last hope of reunion. Heap no coals of fire upon their heads when they are thus borne down and weakened. Do not do that which will render it impossible for so noble a race, consistently with manhood and ordinary self-respect, to do else than perish rather than submit. I would exhaust every means of conciliation that we might have reconciliation, and that this war might be stopped upon the basis of union, of fraternity, and of concord.

Let us hope that the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts to-day may be but the beginning of the end, and that the fell spirit of destruction may cease. In the midst of power, of success, and of victories, let us be generous and just. If it be true, as alleged, that our foe has fallen and lies prostrate at our feet, then with the greater reason can we be magnanimous. Let us forgive and forget the past and allow them once more to resume their position in the Government, sit here in full communion with us, and participate with us in carrying on this great experiment of free Government on the American continent. But if this cannot be, then, as we value our own liberties, let us avoid doing that which is itself a libel on republicanism. Under the pretext of furnishing a republican government to States in rebellion, we are attempting to impose on them a despotism of the most wicked and tyrannical character. The people of Ireland, of Hungary, and of Poland were free as air compared with the condition of degradation to which you seek to reduce the noble men who, though in an unfortunate moment of excitement and error they attempted to pull down the fabric of our Government, are yet blood of our blood, and a race of whom we may well be proud as fellow-citizens of the United States of America.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration asserts some very strange doctrines and implies others no less marvelous. It implies that all the States in rebellion are out of the Union. It implies not only that they are out of the Union, but that they had the constitutional right to go out.

I am aware that the right of States to secede has been a favorite doctrine with gentlemen North as well as South, but never did it attain to any great degree of notoriety till a very recent date. It is a doctrine fraught with the most serious consequences to the American nation. It may subvert the purposes of gentlemen for the time, to accomplish certain political results, but when the doctrine is once approved and acted upon by the American people it then becomes a precedent, a law for future action.

In the view I entertain upon this subject I by no means harmonize with a certain few of my own political faith; men, too, to whom I would humbly yield my views upon all questions of mere policy. But upon a question in my judgment involving the future unity of the States, I cannot allow myself for a moment to believe that the founders of this Government meant less than they expressed in the preamble to the Constitution:

"We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution."

It is unreasonable to believe that they intended that any State might at pleasure, through its Legislature or a convention of its people, and even by a mere majority of one, break the bond of union, and thereby, if not directly destroy, at least hazard the "blessings of liberty" to themselves and posterity. The paramount object they had in view was to secure the "blessings of liberty," and not only make them secure for the time, but to make them perpetual. Any object less than this would have been unwise, if not wicked. Less than this would not have justified the Revolution. Less than this would be mockery of statesmanship. Less than this would not justify an effort to harmonize the present discordant elements. They intended the blessings secured to be lasting; the Union made perpetual. In short, a State once in the Union is always in, except that Union is broken by successful revolution—a result not to be prevented by legal or constitutional enactments. The power granted to the Federal Government "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," clearly implies that it was never intended that the people of any State should put themselves beyond the control of Federal authority by even armed resistance, much less by the more harmless means of legislative resolves. Hence the Federal Government is clothed with military power to enforce its laws in every State of the Union.

Each one of the original thirteen States in its sovereign capacity agreed to abide by the principles of the Constitution and all laws passed in pursuance thereof. In order to make the compliance of the States certain; the Union permanent, and to avoid any conflict among the States, a judicial branch of the Federal Government was provided, whose power and duty are to decide all questions arising under that instrument when presented, and thereby prevent any conflict that might arise between States or the Federal Government and a State. But, sir, despite all these checks and safeguards, so wisely incorporated into the Constitution, whereby every wrong may be redressed and every infraction corrected, we find ourselves involved in two wars—the one the most stupendous and bloody the world has ever seen; the other as yet bloodless, but no less destructive to the spirit and genius of our institutions, if successful.

I shall not indulge in any argument tending to show what has brought upon the country the former, if it were even proper so to do in this debate. Suffice it to say that when the impartial historian shall record the causes of this rebellion he cannot fail to give those who have with so much pertinacity thrust upon the country their higher-law dogmas a prominent position in its pages. Of the latter I speak, for it is more befitting the time and the occasion.

Sir, since my appearance within this Hall as a member of Congress many bills have been presented that were in my judgment unauthorized by the Constitution and revolutionary in their character. Some have passed this body, while others are still pending with at least fair indications of their passing this branch of Congress. Among the most prominent of these was the bill known as the confiscation act, which was characterized for its inhumanity and subversion of the plain intent and meaning of the Constitution, and the bill which has so recently passed Congress amending the Constitution, and the bill under consideration.

Without any violation of parliamentary usage I may be permitted to speak in reference to each of the two last-mentioned measures, though but one is now pending in Congress, for the reason that both measures seek to accomplish the same purpose in part, and the argument applicable to the one is alike applicable to the other.

My colleague, [Mr. Ashley,] in his argument in favor of the bill amending the Constitution, held that the votes of the States in rebellion were not necessary, for the reason that they were not in the Union; and the evidence that they were not in the Union was that they were not represented upon this floor; and no State was known to be in the Union except when acting in harmony with the Constitution.

That I may fully present his views, I quote his own language:

"If the theory that a State once a State is always a State is to obtain in the national administration there is no safety or security for the Government. I do not know, sir, how you would have decided such a question if it had been raised under circumstances such as I have suggested; but I have faith to believe that you would have decided as I would have decided, that this House cannot know of the existence of a State in this Union which has not a civil government organized in subordination to and working in harmony with the national Constitution. Any other decision would have been fatal to our national existence. Let us not set a bad precedent now by declaring that it will require the ratification of twenty-seven States to secure the adoption of this constitutional amendment."

At the last session of Congress the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and I use the term in no ordinary sense, by the support which he and others upon that side of the House gave the confiscation act, tacitly, at least, recognized them as in the Union and subject to our laws. My able and esteemed colleague, [Mr. BLISS,] in his recent speech, has presented the true status of the States. He says:

"Are the States whose people, in part, are in rebellion against the General Government out of the Union in theory and in fact? Are they foreign Powers, and their inhabitants foreign people, not subject to the Constitution and laws of the United States? If so, why do we raise and send mighty hosts to enforce, by the sword, the bayonet, and the cannon, obedience and subjugation to that Constitution and to those laws? If the people of the so-called seceded States are citizens in the Union, why are our courts engaged, under an act of Congress, in confiscating their estates for acts of treason against their Government? Treason implies citizenship; it cannot be committed by an alien or an enemy. If those States are not out of the Union in theory of law, and if their people owe the allegiance to the Government of the United States which is claimed of them, then clearly those States are among the number of States three fourths of whom must unite their voices upon any proposition to amend their Constitution."

If, sir, they are out of the Union, and their votes not requisite in the ratification of this proposed amendment; if they are alien enemies, as claimed by gentlemen on that side of the House, they are then a foreign government de facto; if a foreign government, why make war upon them? Why seek to enforce our laws over them? Why attempt to amend a Constitution they have thrown off and are not bound by? Why complain if foreign Powers recognize them as you recognize them?

Sir, despite the subtlety of your reasoning they are States, and States within the Union, and must so remain till by their prowess they have maintained their separation.

Their votes are therefore necessary to its ratification, and my colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] in his last substitute to the bill under consideration enjoins upon the States in rebellion their approval of the constitutional amendment as a condition precedent to their return to loyalty—thereby virtually acknowledging the necessity of their action. You cannot for one purpose treat them as in the Union and subject to our laws, and for another as out of the Union. If they were in the Union once, and subject to our laws, nothing having changed their relation since, they are still in, and it follows as corollary that they are to be counted in determining whether the proposition has been approved by three fourths of the States.

Gentlemen claim that if three fourths of the States approve, and one fourth disapprove, it becomes a part of the Constitution and binding upon all. With all deference to the opinions of able gentlemen on both sides of the House, I must differ from them. Nothing could have been further from the object of the framers of that instrument than to leave it in such a questionable shape that in a great national convulsion the fundamental principles of republicanism that underlie our system might be upheaved and broken to pieces, and upon its ruins a monarchy established. Yet my colleague, [Mr. COX,] with gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, assert that the power to amend is so broad and so ample that we may establish a monarchy or an autocracy; that we may supplant the President and put in his stead the King of Dahomey. I deny it. It is not in the power of the people to make such a change under the Constitution, even by the concurrence of all the States. It would not be an amendment, but the incorporation of new and original matter entirely foreign to the text. It would be subversive and revolutionary. To amend implies something to amend by, and the amendment must be germane to the subject-matter under consideration. We can submit to the States amendments enlarging or diminishing the powers granted, but we cannot substitute new and different ones. Why, Mr. Speaker, would you rule out of order an amendment offered to a general appropriation bill establishing a court in my State? Because it would not be germane to the subject-matter under consideration. The theory is that there is nothing under consideration akin to it. It is new, original, and foreign, and out of order, and so you would rule. Where, then, can gentlemen find the power to amend so as to change the form of our Government from a republic to an autocracy? Where is the power to transport the King of Dahomey to rule over us? Surely gentlemen will not claim that an autocracy is akin to a republic. You might as well assert that the autocrat is the people, or the people the autocrat, as to assert that a republic may be amended by substituting an autocracy.

If, then, you cannot change the domestic relations in a State by the alteration proposed, how is it possible to do so by bombastic proclamations or congressional enactments like the one under consideration?

Sir, our security as individuals and the security of our system rests in a strict adherence to the principles of the Constitution clearly expressed, and not in making innovations or exercising uncertain powers. If I had seen no constitutional objection to the passage of that bill, policy alone would have prevented my voting for it if I had been present. Not, sir, that I have any sympathy with slavery, for I have not and never had, but to avoid taking the first step in a downward tendency to national ruin. I would not shape the wedge that others in after days might use in great public excitement to national injury. The infant that takes its first step is encouraged thereby to make the effort for the second, and it will take it; and you make the first amendment, and designing politicians with a view to acquire position and power will find a reason for the second; and thus, step by step, will the power of the people be taken from them and given to the few; and power once lost to the people is never regained except by revolution. "It is no time to swap horses while crossing a stream" is more appropriate in this connection than the one in which the author used it. If, sir, you cannot change the Constitution in this regard without infraction, how are you to accomplish the object by mere legislative enactment as contemplated in the bill under consideration?

Mr. Speaker, it would seem as if gentlemen had closed their eyes to every principle of the Constitution, rights of States, and dictates of humanity, and are willing to hazard them all in the wheel of fortune, to confirm a political idea that this Government cannot exist "one half free and the other half slave." There has been no bill introduced into this House that so clearly demonstrates this feeling as the one under consideration. Many of its provisions find no sanction in our legislative guide, the Constitution. Where does my colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] find authority for Congress to determine who shall and who shall not vote at the primary elections in the rebellious States? I am aware that the fourth section and first article of the Constitution gives power to determine the time, place, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives to Congress, but not the qualification of electors, much less to control the elections purely local. Yet that power is assumed in this bill. Where is the power given to determine what, if any, number less than a majority of all the electors of a State shall control? And where is the authority to be found enabling Congress to authorize negroes to vote at the State elections? All this is provided for in this bill, and without authority.

My colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] may claim that the bill does not confer the elective franchise upon the negroes of those States in rebellion. Let us see. By reference to the original bill and the seventh section of the second substitute thereto, the provisional governor was required to enroll all white male citizens of the United States resident in the State; but in the third section of the substitute now presented the word white is omitted. For what purpose, if not to let the negro vote? I am aware that the decision in the Dred Scott case has determined that a negro is not a citizen of the United States; but who among the higher-law party give it the least vitality? When, sir, in time of profound peace these men denounced and disregarded it, it is not at all likely they intend to be governed by it under present circumstances. It is intended by this bill to permit them to vote at the elections to be held in those States; and it is but another evidence of New England domination; another evidence of that revolutionary spirit that has characterized the legislation of the country for three years past; another evidence in favor of the doctrine of the equality of the races, socially and politically.

The eighth section of the bill provides—

That the convention shall declare, on behalf of the people of the State, their submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and shall adopt the following provisions, hereby prescribed by the United States in the execution of the constitutional duty to guaranty a republican form of government to every State, and incorporate them in the constitution of the State, that is to say:

First. No person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, except civil offices merely ministerial and military offices below the grade of colonel, State or Confederate, under the usurping power, shall vote for or be a member of the Legislature or Governor.

Second. Involuntary servitude is forever prohibited, and freedom and equality of civil rights before the law are guaranteed to all persons in said State.

Third. No debt, State or Confederate, created by or under the sanction of the usurping power, or in any manner in aid thereof, shall be recognized or paid by the State; and all acts, judicial or legislative, for the confiscation or forfeiture of any debt, property, or franchise, of any loyal citizen of the United States, are hereby declared null and void.

Mr. Speaker, at the last session of Congress the Secretary of the Treasury demanded the passage of an act prohibiting the traffic in gold, better known in financial circles as Chase's folly. It was done. The Secretary of War insisted upon a repeal of the commutation clause in the enrollment act, and it was granted. And the President has without law or authority issued his emancipation proclamation, and subsequently his edict that no State in rebellion should return to her allegiance till she had first emancipated her slaves, and at once two bills were thrust into this House for that purpose. Sir, in former days these demands would have been treated as an indignity offered to the legislative branch of the Government. I impute no subserviency to any gentlemen, but it is strange these demands have so often been made and as often granted. No matter how absurd the demand or unjust the requirement, a reason is found for the one and a constitutional injunction for the other.

My colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] assumes that the fourth section of article three of the Constitution confers the power on Congress to prescribe changes in the organic law of the original States of the Confederacy:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

Many of the States now in rebellion were the original States forming this Union, and ratified the Constitution. It was not thought then, or for over seventy years thereafter, but that their local governments were republican. It was reserved for the transcendent wisdom of this age, this Congress, to determine the fact and to publish to the world the imbecility of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and all the worthies we were wont to dote upon for recognizing them as such. Despite our assumed wisdom, by the tests of the national Chart they are what they were considered to be by the founders of this Republic.

This provision presupposes the States which would ratify the Constitution had republican forms of government, and pledges the combined powers of them all to preserve, secure, and defend each and all of them in the enjoyment of that or any other form they might thereafter adopt in harmony with the spirit of the Constitution. It not only applies to the original States of the Union, but all others that might be admitted. The word "guaranty" does not imply the power to create, prescribe, or dictate, but to secure and defend what is already in existence. The sense in which it is used in that section is to secure and defend republicanism as defined in the Constitution. But the sense in which it is used in this bill is to prescribe, dictate, originate. They "shall adopt the following provisions hereby prescribed by the United States in the execution of the constitutional duty to guaranty a republican form of government to every State."

Who, sir, ever heard that it was anti-republican for any man to hold a civil office to which he had been elected by the sovereign people of his State? Who ever heard that it was anti-republican for the people of a State to pay any debt, no matter what its origin? Sir, it is anti-republican to dictate it, usurpation of power on the part of the Federal Government to exercise it, and revolutionary in its character. If you have the power to prescribe for Georgia a change in her organic law from what it has hitherto been, you have the right to say to my State what debts, if any, we shall pay, and what school of politicians shall hold office. Such power does not exist in the Federal Government, and it is well for the liberties of the people and the sovereignty of the States that it does not.

There is no mistaking the tendency of legislation under the present rule, it is centralization. Gentlemen upon this floor do not hesitate discrediting the popular ideas of Thomas Jefferson and applauding those of Alexander Hamilton. The theory of the one was the power of the people for self-government and the retention of that power in their hands, while that of the other was the incapacity of the people to govern themselves and the centralization of that power in the hands of the few; in short, to create such a government as my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] rejoices we are approximating. He says:

"I am surprised that both the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] declare that this measure would aggrandize the executive authority. I must say that, to me, it is one objection to this plan that it may have exactly the opposite effect. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the fame of Jefferson is waning, and the fame of Hamilton waxing, in the estimation of the American people, and that we are gravitating toward a stronger Government."

Sir, while my colleague rejoices that such is the tendency of the times, the people regret that such is the downward course of freedom. It is a warning to the people to be more chary of their liberties in time of a great national convulsion than at any other. It is a warning to them to thunder at the prison doors till they fly from their fastenings and free the innocent captives; to demand the reestablishment of that ancient writ of liberty, and to upturn your courts-martial for the trial of private citizens.

Mr. Speaker, in the better days of the Republic such men as Clay, Calhoun, Benton, Webster, Cass, and Douglas, would debate months upon the power of Congress to even prohibit slavery in Territories of the United States; but now gentlemen find not the least objection to prescribe a form of government for the people of a State. If gentlemen wish to preserve the Union, the right of States and citizens, you must shut your eyes to slavery and make this war a war for the Union of the States and the supremacy of the laws. You must close this bloody carnival. You must treat in perfect good faith for peace upon the basis of the Constitution and the Union. You must carry out the ideas of General Sherman, making the prerequisite to peace the laying down of their arms and the acquiescence in our laws. To him the thanks of the people are due, not only for his military genius, but for the humane and statesmanlike view he has taken of the duty of a rebellious people. There is but one way of disposing of this question so as not to do violence to our political system. Cease this vicious and partisan legislation; treat the States in rebellion as in the Union, and not out; the citizens in arms as rebels, not alien enemies, and when you have done this you have swept away the cobwebs of seeming complication, and the way is comparatively clear to a bright future.

I hope, sir, this bill may not pass.

Mr. ARNOLD asked and obtained permission to print a speech. [It will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. BLOW and Mr. EDGERTON then addressed the House. [Their speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, submitting estimates of appropriations to supply a deficiency for the Chippewas of Red Lake and Pembina Indians, under the fourth and fifth articles of the treaty of 2d October, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, information in relation to the list of names of State or political prisoners required to be furnished to the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States and of the District of Columbia, by the second section of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a petition of soldiers now in the ninth Army corps, praying for a bounty of $300 to all who enlisted in the Army for the period of three years between the 1st day of April, 1864, and the 4th day of July, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the Manitowoc river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. POMEROY presented the memorial of L. H. Bunnell, praying that the Winnebago Indians on the Missouri river may be settled upon the Omaha reservation, and that provision may be made for the education of such of the tribe as reside in the State of Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of M. R. Patrick, provost marshal general of the army operating against Richmond, remonstrating against the issuing of whisky by the subsistence department of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I present the petition of E. M. Dennison, crier of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, making a very earnest cry for an increase of his compensation. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a communication of David Gowdey, addressed to him, alleging certain inaccuracies in the census report of 1860 in regard to the number and location of reed-makers in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of the principal chief and delegates of the Cherokee nation, praying that the interest due on the investment of the Cherokee national funds may be appropriated and paid over to the authorities of the nation in conformity with the provisions of their treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of officers and survivors of the United States monitor Tecumseh and the United States steamer Philippi, praying compensation for losses sustained by them in the loss of those vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of the president of the West Cheshire railroad of New Hampshire remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. FOOT presented two communications from the Postmaster General to the House of Representatives, and printed by order of the House as Executive Document No. 27 of the present session, on the subject of a patent canceling and marking stamp used by that Department; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. ANTHONY presented a petition of Benjamin Tilley, praying compensation for the use of certain lots in the city of Washington, by the quartermaster's department, from February 1, 1863, to February 1, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg leave to present joint resolutions of the Legislature of Maryland passed a few days since, remonstrating against Congress granting a charter to make a railroad in that State. There is a preamble accompanying the joint resolution, which I beg leave to state for the information of the Senate. It sets forth that a charter was granted by Maryland to build a railroad from the city of Baltimore to the borough of York, Pennsylvania, a point on the dividing-line between the two States of Maryland and Pennsylvania; that the State and the citizens of the State of Maryland contributed nearly all the means for the construction of that road; and that the State, with a view to encourage the road, upon which it had an incumbrance of over a million and a half of dollars, surrendered that incumbrance for the benefit of the company. The Legislature states also that there is now between Washington and Baltimore a double track amply sufficient to answer all the purposes which the Government or the citizens of the country may require either to transport merchandise or passengers between the two termini, Washington and Baltimore. It also states that the Legislature of Maryland have been in session for some time, and of course were in session when these resolutions were passed, and no application has been made to that Legislature to construct another road between Baltimore and the District of Columbia; that they were always willing to do so, provided they should be satisfied that the necessities of the country or the convenience of the country required a different road. They then represent that they understand that a bill is about to be submitted to Congress to authorize the Northern Central railroad, built, as far as it runs in Maryland, with Maryland credit and Maryland funds, and encouraged, as I have stated, by a surrender of $1,500,000 to the company by the State, to construct a road from Washington to some point on the line of their railroad; and the Legislature protests in very respectful terms against the passage of any such act, and asks that if it should come either before the Senate or the House of Representatives the Legislature may by its agents be permitted to be heard. I move that the resolutions lie on the table, as there is nothing before the Senate at this time on the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that any of the banks of the District of Columbia that have availed themselves of the benefits of an act of Congress of June 17, 1844, "to extend the charters of the District banks," shall be authorized, by their trustees and directors, to accept in like manner with the banks of the several States the provisions of the forty-fourth section of the act approved June 3, 1864, entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by the pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof."

SURRENDER OF CHARLESTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following telegram, received to-day by the War Department:

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, February 18, 1865.
Via New York February 21.

GENERAL: The city of Charleston and all its defenses came into our possession this morning, with about two hundred pieces of good artillery and a supply of fine ammunition. The enemy commenced evacuating all the works last night, and Mayor Macbeth surrendered the city to the troops of General Schimmelfinnig at nine o'clock this morning, at which time it was occupied by our forces.

Our advance on the Edisto and from Bull's bay hastened the retreat.

The cotton warehouses, arsenals, quartermaster's stores, railroad bridges, and two iron-clads were burnt by the enemy. Some vessels in the ship-yard were also burnt. Nearly all the inhabitants remaining behind belong to the poorer classes.

Very respectfully,

O. A. GILLMORE,

Major General Commanding.

Major General HALLECK, Chief of Staff.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed on the 20th instant the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 212) for the relief of Henry A. Brigham;

A bill (S. No. 410) to enlarge the port of entry and delivery for the district of Philadelphia.

INTERCOURSE WITH INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. SPRAGUE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 398) to repeal the eighth section of an act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July 2, 1864; and it was ordered to be printed.

COURTS IN NEVADA.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes, which has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. This is a bill which stands as the unfinished business of the morning hour, and there are special reasons why it should be considered. As I have already stated in the hearing of many Senators, there are five causes now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States dependent upon action upon this bill, and they are postponed until the 27th of this month, when they will drop unless action is had; and one of those causes alone involves property to the amount of between two and three hundred thousand dollars. I trust, therefore, the Senate will take up the bill and act upon it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to strike out the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth sections of the original bill and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the salary of the district judge for the district of Nevada shall be $3,500 per annum, payable in four equal installments on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October of each year; and the marshal and district attorney of the United States for said district shall severally be entitled to charge and receive, for the services they may perform, the fees and compensation now allowed by law, to wit, by the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 25, 1853, for similar services. The clerks of the said district and circuit courts shall be appointed in the manner now prescribed by law for the appointment of such officers. They shall be subject to the same rules and regulations, shall perform the same duties, and be entitled to charge and receive the same fees and compensation as officers of like character in the other districts and circuits of the United States for like services.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Nevada, may be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the district court of the United States for the district of Nevada, or to the supreme court of the State of Nevada, as the nature of said appeal or writ of error may require, and each of these courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of Nevada Territory as to all such cases, with full power to hear and determine the same, and to award mesne or final process thereon. And from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory of Nevada, prior to its admission into the Union as a State, the parties to said judgments and decrees shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Federal courts as they would have had under the laws of the United States if this act had been passed simultaneously with the act admitting said State into the Union.

Mr. STEWART. When I was cut off by the order of business which intervened the other day I was addressing myself to that portion of the amendment which relates to the compensation to be paid to the clerks, and marshals, &c., of these courts in Nevada. I was endeavoring to show that there was no good reason why a different compensation should not be allowed in Nevada from that allowed throughout the United States; in fact that every reason of justice was in favor of allowing such compensation as would enable the officers to perform the duties imposed upon them by the bill. It is hardly worth while to organize courts there unless we can have officers sufficiently paid to discharge the duties. We have been particularly annoyed in Nevada Territory by the insufficient compensation paid to officers. They were sent among us with not sufficient compensation to pay their board bills, and they have been subjected to all manner of temptations. In examining the organization of different courts I find there has been no regard paid to uniformity so far as compensation is concerned. Different district judges in different localities receive different compensation, regulated by the expense of living, the amount of business, and other considerations.

The fees allowed in this proposed amendment are entirely inadequate; for instance, ten cents a mile to the marshal for traveling expenses to serve process. In the State of Nevada, if process is to be served in a distant portion of the State, for instance at Rees River, one hundred and eighty miles or more, the compensation would be eighteen dollars. The stage fare each way would be forty dollars, and it would take the marshal eight or ten days, at an expense, counting only the mere expense of his living, of twenty or twenty-five dollars more; and thus he would be the loser of nearly one hundred dollars in attempting to serve process at a distant point. That simply illustrates the whole project of the Committee on the Judiciary; it is entirely inadequate. The original House bill, as a matter of economy, is better than the substitute proposed by the committee, for the reason that it provides but one clerk for both the district and circuit courts, which is entirely ample, and it only requires one clerk's office, which will be a saving of at least $100 a month to the Government, and that will more than compensate for all that the Government will have to pay for the additional fees.

But I will say no more upon that point. It seems to me it is too plain for argument that those things should be regulated in accordance with the condition of the country. When Senators reflect that in many parts of the State of Nevada the cost of freight, whereby we get our provisions, is from eighteen to twenty-five cents a pound, they will see that there should be a different compensation allowed to us. There has been a different compensation allowed in California and Oregon, showing that there has been no adherence to this supposed rule.

But the most objectionable and the most important feature of this whole measure is the sixth section proposed to be inserted, and this is a matter of very grave importance to the people that I represent:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Nevada, may be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the district court of the United States for the district of Nevada, or to the supreme court of the State of Nevada, as the nature of said appeal or writ of error may require, and each of these courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of Nevada Territory as to all such cases, with full power to hear and determine the same, and to award mesne or final process thereon. And from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory of Nevada, prior to its admission into the Union as a State, the parties to said judgments and decrees shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Federal courts as they would have had under the laws of the United States if this act had been passed simultaneously with the act admitting said State into the Union.

My first objection to this provision is that it is unprecedented. I have not been able to find legislation of this character in any of the statutes of the United States. My second objection to it is that it is unconstitutional; and my third objection is that it is highly prejudicial to the interests of our new State. It is not asked for by the delegation from the Pacific, and not asked for by the people that we represent. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives is agreed to by the whole Pacific delegation. The only act that is at all analogous to this is the one for Minnesota which was passed simultaneously with the act admitting Minnesota into the Union, and which, if constitutional, must be regarded as constitutional upon the hypothesis that the Government can impose conditions upon the admission of a new State. I am not aware, however, that this provision in the act admitting Minnesota has been upheld by the courts. One case was determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, from Minnesota, after its admission; but this question of jurisdiction was not raised in that case.

The proposition here is by an act of Congress to give the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction of cases that are of State cognizance. By what authority it is proposed, when it is once lost, to confer this jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court of the United States, after we have become a State, I am not able to see. The only jurisdiction that your courts can exercise in the State of Nevada now is Federal jurisdiction under the Federal Constitution. The cases now appealed to your Supreme Court from the territorial courts may or may not be of Federal jurisdiction. They probably are not; but at all events they did not originate in the Federal courts, do not come from the Federal courts, and, so far as my knowledge is concerned, none of them are of Federal jurisdiction. It was stated here that there were two of the cases to which reference has been made in which the Government of the United States was a party. I have examined the matter, and, as I supposed, it is a mistake. There are two tax cases in which the Territory of Nevada was a party. Those cases were decided in favor of the Territory; and if this bill should pass, as proposed to be amended, it will reopen those cases against the interests of the Territory. There are two or three other cases, one or two of money demands, and one or two mining cases, before the court.

Now, to show that this amendment, if passed, would be unconstitutional, I beg leave to refer the Senate to a few decisions bearing upon this subject. The Territory of Florida, previous to its admission as a State, was organized as the other Territories are, with territorial courts, under the general power of Congress to organize and control the Territories, and not under the judiciary act. Florida was unconditionally admitted as Nevada has been.

The constitution of Florida provided for the continuance of territorial courts until the State organization should go into operation. After the admission of that State the Legislature thereof passed an act transferring causes of State jurisdiction to the State courts. Subsequent to this, Congress passed an act transferring Federal causes to the United States district court of Florida. The case before me of Benner vs. Porter was one of Federal jurisdiction, commenced in the territorial court after the admission of the State, and transferred under the act of Congress to the district court of the United States for the district of Florida, and by appeal from that court to the Supreme Court of the United States. Although the identical question now under consideration was not before the court yet the general principles laid down in that case shed some light upon the points in review.

The Supreme Court of the United States held that the State having been unconditionally admitted, although the territorial courts were continued in existence by the constitution of Florida, although they had a nominal existence still with their old jurisdiction, the Congress of the United States had no concern in the matter; and the court in considering that case—

Mr. JOHNSON. What book does the Senator cite?

Mr. STEWART. Ninth Howard.

Mr. JOHNSON. What page?

Mr. STEWART. The case commences on page 235. The court in considering the case uniformly place stress upon the idea that the State was unconditionally admitted, that it was a sovereign State, and that there was no power in Congress to regulate the jurisdiction of the courts in that State except the Federal jurisdiction that they derived from the Federal Constitution; that the territorial courts were not creatures of the Constitution under its judicial power. Judge Nelson, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"No conditions were annexed, except that she should not interfere with the disposal of the public lands, nor levy any tax on the same while they remained the property of the United States."

And further:

"After the unconditional admission of the Territory into the Union as a State, on the 3d of March, 1845, with her constitution and complete organization of the government under it, by which the authority of the State was established throughout her limits, it is difficult to see upon what ground it can be maintained that any portion of the territorial government or jurisdiction remained still in force.

"The distinction between the Federal and State jurisdictions under the Constitution of the United States has no foundation in these territorial governments; and, consequently no such distinction exists, either in respect to the jurisdiction of their courts or the subjects submitted to their cognizance. They are legislative governments, and their courts legislative courts, Congress, in the exercise of its powers in the organization and government of the Territories, combining the powers of both the Federal and State authorities. There is but one system of government or of laws operating within their limits, as neither is subject to the constitutional provisions in respect to State and Federal jurisdiction.

"They are not organized under the Constitution, nor subject to its complete distribution of the powers of Government, as the organic law; but are the creations, exclusively, of the legislative department, and subject to its supervision and control. Whether or not there are provisions in that instrument which extend to and act upon these territorial governments, it is not now material to examine. We are speaking here of those provisions that refer particularly to the distinction between Federal and State jurisdiction.

"We think it clear, therefore, that on the unconditional admission of Florida into the Union as a State, on the 3d of March, 1845, the territorial government was displaced, abrogated, every part of it; and that no power of jurisdiction existed within her limits, except that derived from the State authority, and that by force and operation of the Federal Constitution and laws of Congress, and especially no jurisdiction in Federal cases until Congress interfered and extended the judicial tribunals of the Union over it."

Then he goes on to discuss further, and says:

"The admission of the State into the Union brought the Territory under the full and complete operation of the Federal Constitution, and the judicial power of the Union could be exercised only in conformity to the provisions of that instrument. By article three, section one, 'the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish.' The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior."

Then he goes on to speak of the various acts at length, and says:

"From the examination we have given to the legislation upon the admission of several of the new States into the Union, we have found but few instances of any provision having been made in respect to the cases pending in the old government, and those are limited to the transfer of the Federal cases to the district court organized in the new State. In some of the constitutions of the States provision had been made for the pending business of appropriate State jurisdiction, but not in all of them. A very slight attention to the subject by Congress, at the time, would remove all the difficulties that have occurred in several of the States recently admitted.

"Upon the whole, we are satisfied that the territorial government of Florida became superseded on the unconditional admission of the Territory into the Union as a State, on the 3d of March, 1845, and consequently that the court below, whose authority depended upon that government, had no jurisdiction to render the decree in the case, and that the decree must be reversed."

This only bears incidentally upon the question; but I think it involves the same principle. There is a suggestion in it that legislation should occur at the same time that the State was admitted. Perhaps from that decision the idea was conceived of ingrafting the provision to which I have referred in the Minnesota constitution, for it was prior to the admission of Minnesota as a State. But in 10 Howard the court, in referring to the same case, and treating of this question of jurisdiction, plainly declare that the State courts cannot be made the successors of the territorial courts so as to enable the Supreme Court of the United States to send its mandates to them in cases of State jurisdiction; and the doctrine that simultaneous legislation, which might be regarded as a condition of admission into the Union, can confer jurisdiction in a case like the present upon the Supreme Court of the United States, is very questionable.

I will now read somewhat from the opinion in McNulty vs. Batty et al., 10 Howard, 72. This was a case that came up from Wisconsin, the writ of error having been issued on the 20th of November, 1847, and the State admitted May 29, 1848. Here was a case situated precisely as the cases now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States from the Territory of Nevada; it was in the Supreme Court of the United States prior to the admission of the State of Wisconsin into the Union; but what did the Supreme Court say?

"The writ of error having been issued on the 20th of November, 1847, was, therefore, regularly issued during the existence of the territorial government, and the case was pending in this court at the time when that government ceased, and with it the jurisdiction and power of the territorial courts."

After citing the provisions of the act for the admission of Wisconsin, which I need not read, the court said:

"By the admission of the State of Wisconsin into the Union, on the 29th of May, 1848, the territorial government ceased to exist, and all the authority under it, including the laws organizing its courts of justice and providing for a revision of their judgments in this court by appeals or writs of error. This appellate power does not depend upon the judicial act of 1789, but upon laws regulating the judicial proceedings of the Territory. And these necessarily ceased with the termination of the territorial government."

"In the case of the United States vs. Boisdore's heirs, (8 Howard, 121.) it is said that as this court can exercise no appellate power over cases unless conferred upon it by act of Congress, if the act conferring the jurisdiction has expired the jurisdiction ceases, although the appeal or writ of error be actually pending in the court at the time of the expiration of the act."

"The cases on this point are referred to in the brief in that case, and afford full authority for the principle, if any were needed."—Hill, 328; 9 Barn. & Cres., 750; 3 Burr, 1456; 4 Moore & Payne, 341.

In the present case, it will be seen that by the act admitting the State of Nevada the Supreme Court of the United States lost all jurisdiction over the cases that were then pending. They were, so to speak, as if they had not been appealed to that court; it lost all power and all jurisdiction over them. The question, then, resolves itself into this, whether, the Supreme Court of the United States now having no jurisdiction under any previous law, being entirely destitute of jurisdiction over these cases, they being really of State jurisdiction and not of Federal jurisdiction, Congress now has the power to confer jurisdiction of them upon the Supreme Court of the United States. It is jurisdiction that legitimately belongs to State authority; it has not been reserved to the Supreme Court of the United States by any act contemporaneous with the admission; it has not been reserved by anything that passed before. This, then, is simply a question whether Congress can confer upon the Supreme Court of the United States authority to hear and determine cases not of Federal but of State jurisdiction. Whether this power could have been saved by a reservation in the act admitting the State it is not material here to consider, but I shall hereafter show that this jurisdiction was not saved.

But the opinion in the case from which I have just read, in 10 Howard, goes further, and strongly intimates that the jurisdiction could not have been saved by any act of Congress, and I think it intimates plainly that an act like that passed in the case of Minnesota would have been unconstitutional. The court say, immediately after the passage I last cited:

"The writ of error, therefore, fell with the abrogation of the statute upon which it was founded."

"Besides, since the termination of the territorial government, there is no court in existence to which the mandate of this court could be sent to carry into effect our judgment."

It would be a thing never heard of for the Supreme Court of the United States to send a mandate to the supreme court of a State, commanding it to carry into effect the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case of State and not of Federal jurisdiction.

"Our power, therefore, would be incomplete and ineffectual, were we to consent to a review of the case. (Pahoa vs. Hunt, 4 Howard, 569.) And, had the records been transferred to the district court, as in the Federal cases, we do not see but that the result must have been the same; for the case being one not of Federal jurisdiction, should the judgment be affirmed or reversed, and sent down to that court, it would possess no power to carry the mandate into execution, having no power over the case under the Constitution or laws of Congress conferring jurisdiction upon the Federal courts."—Constitution of the United States, art. 3, sec. 2; Judiciary Act of 1789, sec. 11.

After stating some other matters which I will not take up the time of the Senate by reading, the judge plainly intimates, as I have suggested, that if it had been a part of the act admitting the State into the Union that would not have saved it, for he says:

"In placing the want of jurisdiction, however, upon this ground, we must not be understood as intimating that if the provisions of the Florida act of the 23d of February, 1847, applied to the case, the jurisdiction could be upheld."

An act, passed subsequent to the admission of Florida, provided that cases pending in the territorial courts should be transferred to the United States district court, and heard and determined there, and go from there up to the Supreme Court of the United States, but did not provide that a territorial case pending in the Supreme Court of the United States might be determined there. It was a general act providing for sending territorial causes, pending in the territorial courts, to the district court of the newly-organized State, and then appealing them to the Supreme Court of the United States, but did not provide for a case like this, where an appeal is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States from the Territory of Nevada.

The learned judge says that if that act covered the case, (and his previous discussion had shown that it did not provide for a case already pending in the Supreme Court of the United States,) if it had been passed as a general law applying to all future admitted States, he does not see how it could be upheld.

"In placing the want of jurisdiction, however, upon this ground, we must not be understood as admitting that if the provisions of the Florida act of the 23d of February, 1847, applied to the case, the jurisdiction could be upheld. For, if we are right in the conclusion, that even assuming the record in the case had been transferred from the territorial to the district court of the State, our jurisdiction would still be incomplete and ineffectual, inasmuch as that court possessed no power to carry the mandate into execution, the case not being one of Federal jurisdiction, the result would be the same as that at which we have arrived."

Then we say that this opinion of Judge Nelson, being the opinion of the Supreme Court in that case, clearly intimates that it is impossible upon the admission of a State to provide for retaining jurisdiction of causes, which are properly of State cognizance, in any of the Federal courts, not excepting the Supreme Court of the United States; and certainly after that jurisdiction has been lost, after the State of Nevada has been admitted on an equal footing with all the other States, when there has been no attempt on the part of Congress to reserve to the courts of the United States any part of the jurisdiction, this power surely does not exist. It cannot be claimed that this was a condition of our admission as a State. It cannot be claimed that this case is different than it would be if Congress were to attempt to pass an act that some case of State jurisdiction before a court in the great State of New York should, notwithstanding the Constitution of the United States, notwithstanding the law as it now stands, be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and that a State court in New York should be the successor of some other court, and should be subject to the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States in a matter of State jurisdiction. I cannot see that this case stands in any different position from that.

Again, we claim that the legislation here proposed interferes with vested rights at this time. In these cases judgments have been rendered in the territorial courts. These judgments are now absolute, and it is no matter how they became absolute so far as the question of power is concerned. We have the right to regard them as absolute. Under these judgments rights have been secured; under these judgments large improvements have been made upon mining claims that have been determined; under these judgments process has been issued and parties have been put in possession. I regret that I have not a copy of our State constitution before me; I did not bring a copy with me, and I have been unable to procure one here; but I will state for the information of the Senate that our State constitution provides for the transfer of all pending cases and of all judgments from the territorial courts to the State courts, and they have been transferred there and executed there.

It seems to me that the question now presented should be governed by the well-known rule that the Legislature will not interfere with vested rights by way of granting an appeal where one does not exist. That question has been considered and decided, and I need not refer to the authorities upon it. I admit that it is a very nice and delicate point to draw the exact line between vested rights and those that may be regulated by legislation. The decisions are extremely conflicting; but there is one general principle that governs them all: that no legislative act should be passed by any legislative body looking to the past until it clearly appears that there is urgent demand for it. Some such acts have been upheld by the courts, it would seem more because there was an urgent demand for them in the name of justice than because they were strictly constitutional, and that appears to be the reason why there is so much difficulty in drawing the line between what are and what are not vested rights.

It is, however, laid down as a general principle that vested rights should not be disturbed. It is a question which has been discussed in almost all the States of the Union, and the impropriety of interfering with vested rights under their constitutions and on general principles has been maintained. In Mr. E. F. Smith's Commentaries on Statute and Constitutional Law and Construction, section 360, he says:

"In Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire it has been repeatedly held that the Legislature could not constitutionally pass an act granting an appeal or a review or a new trial in any case between private persons. (Lewis vs. Webb, 3 Greenl. R. 326; Dunham vs. Lewiston, 4 Greenl. R. 140; Bates vs. Kimball, 2 Chip. R. 77; Stamford vs. Barry, 1 Aik. R. 314.) In the State of Maine the Legislature, in 1824, passed an act granting an appeal from a decree theretofore made by the judge of probate, and directing the judge of probate to allow, and the supreme court to sustain, proceed, and decree in the same in the like manner as if the appeal had been claimed and granted pursuant to an existing law on the day of making the decree. The constitutionality of this act came in question in the case of Lewis et al. vs. Webb, above cited. One point made was that it was a judicial act, and therefore transcended the powers of the Legislature, to which this authority was expressly interdicted by article three, sections one and two, of the constitution of Maine. In the decision of this question, Mellen, C. J., said: 'What is the nature of the power exercised by the Legislature in passing said resolve; is it of a legislative or judicial character?' In answering this inquiry, he held: the terms used in the first section, as to three departments of government, were general, and the phraseology of the second section, prohibiting the interference of the departments, was also general. Hence, as in the instance then before the court, a question arose: what exercise of power by those belonging to one department is to be considered as an invasion of the province of either of the other departments? In reply to this, it might be said at once, that if the Legislature undertake to exercise judicial power, they invade the province of the judiciary, because the constitution and the laws had placed all the judicial power in other hands."

But the question returns, did the Legislature exercise a judicial power in granting to the appellants the right of appeal? In form they did not; but if it was such in substance and effect it would clearly be a violation of the spirit, if not of the very language of the Constitution. Whatever might be considered the nature and character of the decree, since the appeal was claimed, it was very clear that at the time the Legislature passed the resolve it was in full force and virtue, and had been for almost five years. The rights of heirs or creditors in the subject-matter of that decree vested when it was passed, and so remained undisturbed until the resolve professed to grant the appellants leave to disturb them. The ordinary and legal consequence of an appeal was to vacate at once the judgment or decree appealed from; had that effect been produced in the present instance? Or was the decree of the judge of probate in full force then, and the administrator liable to have a second decree passed against him by the court on the same account? Such a decree passed by the court would not operate to relieve the administrator from the effect of the existing decree, unless the resolve and the appeal claimed in virtue of it had completely vacated that decree; and if it was not vacated thereby, why was it not a bar to all proceedings in court when relied upon as such? In fact, this appeal could not be sustained on any other principles than that of its having produced the usual effect of an ordinary appeal; that was, having vacated the decree below. Could the Legislature, by a mere resolve, set aside a judgment or a decree of a judicial court, and render it null and void? This was an exercise of power common in courts of law, a power not questioned, but it was one purely judicial in its nature and its consequences. It was one of the striking and peculiar features of judicial power, that it was displayed in the decision of controversies between contending parties, the settlement of their rights, and redress of their wrongs. But it was urged that the resolve was not liable to objection on constitutional ground; that the resolve went no further than to authorize a re-examination of the cause, to empower one judicial court to review the proceedings of another judicial court, by way of appeal, and thus do complete and final justice to all concerned. It was true the resolve did not in terms purport to transfer property directly from one man to another by mere legislative authority; but it professed to grant to one party in a cause which had been according to existing laws finally decided especial authority to compel the other party, contrary to the general law of the land, to submit his cause to another court for trial, the consequence of which might be the total loss of all those rights and all that property which the judgment complained of had entitled him to hold and enjoy; that is to say, it professed to accomplish, in an indirect and circuitous manner, that which existing laws forbade, and which, by a direct and legal course, could not be obtained; and to perform an act respecting a cause between party and party; an act, therefore, of a judicial character in the simple form of legislation. Such a law could not be reasonable within the meaning of that term, as used in the Constitution in the grant of legislative power."

This writer goes on to discuss the question, and says it makes no difference how it is gotten at, whether by circumlocution or by a direct act.

Having said thus much upon the constitutionality of the proposed provision, and thus much upon its being unprecedented, I come now to present some important questions of policy, and I hope that the Senate will listen and weigh well the considerations which I am to present on this point. It seems to me that they ought to be conclusive.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 69.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair now to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope that will be laid aside informally until we dispose of this bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to allowing the unfinished business to lie over informally in order that the Senator from Nevada may finish his speech; but I do not desire that the unfinished business of last evening shall lose its place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be regarded as passed over informally, subject to the right of the Senator from Wisconsin to call it up at any moment.

Mr. STEWART. I now propose to present some reasons of public policy, I think of a high character, so far as we are concerned, why this bill should not pass with the amendments proposed by the committee. In regard to the cases now pending before the Supreme Court, I am somewhat embarrassingly situated. I was engaged in the court below on different sides in those cases; in some I was for the plaintiff, in others for the defendant. My connection, however, ceased in the court below, and I did not expect to have it continue here. I am now only to regard the question of continuing them before the court as to its effect upon the community, upon the new State of Nevada, and upon the Pacific coast generally.

In the case of Lowndale vs. Parrish, reported in 21 Howard, which went up from the Territory of Oregon before the passage of any law making a disposition of the public lands in that Territory, the Supreme Court of the United States held that neither party having any interest in the land, the appeal should be dismissed; in other words, that until Congress makes some disposition of the public lands, all parties occupying those lands are simply naked trespassers, and must be so treated. It is like a case which I may suppose. Suppose the Senator from Oregon and myself should be wanton enough to go into the parlor of the Senator from Connecticut, break up his furniture, and get into a litigation before a court of which he was the judge, of course he would be so situated that he must protect the property in this parlor; and he would say to the Senator from Oregon who was claiming damages from me, "Why are you claiming damages for something done to my property; it belongs to me; you are both trespassers, and I will treat you so." That is the rule that has been established by the Supreme Court of the United States. The court has said further that upon the public lands of the United States, where neither party could show title derived from the Government or from some source which the Government had recognized, no question of prior possession could be heard; and consequently if you bring an action of ejectment, and have no principle to rely upon but prior possession, it must go out of court. Now, what will be the situation of all our litigation? We come before the court with a mining case; and one of two decisions must be made: the Supreme Court will either reverse the case for want of jurisdiction in the court below and send it down and order it to be there dismissed; or will simply dismiss it here because the Supreme Court has no jurisdiction. The great inconvenience of placing the Supreme Court in a position where it will be bound to make these decisions can hardly be appreciated.

In Nevada we have had in the last five years much litigation, and important litigation, in settling the property of that country; much of the property of the country has gone through the courts. We have had probably as much litigation as any State of New England, if not all of New England, in the last five years. We have judgments of our courts under which millions of property are now held. Improvements have been made on a grand and magnificent scale, the rights of the parties being based upon the decisions of our courts. Those decisions recognize the mining rules of the country as the common law. They allow us to recover upon prior possession, under the rules and regulations established and enforced by the miners. We have been allowed to go on in this manner for the last sixteen years upon the Pacific coast. No legislation has been had on the part of Congress to give us any title which the Supreme Court of the United States will recognize. We have settled our titles among ourselves by the tacit consent of the Government of the United States. Large and prosperous communities have grown up under that system. The common law as administered among us is well understood. There is nothing, however, upon which the Supreme Court can act. If a case comes before it where a party has been ruthlessly ejected from his mine by a "jumper," as we term him, an intruder, and the rightful possessor sues to recover possession, and the case goes into the Supreme Court of the United States, that court will say to the plaintiff, "It is the property of the Government of the United States, and you have nothing upon which to recover." In other words, for Congress to allow these cases to be adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States is to declare that he who came last, he who came and by force ejected the rightful possessor, who had spent his whole life, perhaps, in discovering the mine, he who was strong enough by force to obtain and hold possession, shall remain in possession; and you seek to bring all this litigation before the Supreme Court of the United States for them to declare this rule.

Now I say that in all justice and fairness before, for any private purpose, to satisfy any particular litigant, you require the Supreme Court of the United States to pass upon these titles, you should provide some law whereby the settlers of that country can be protected in their titles. Will you pass a law that in the courts of the United States the local rules and regulations of the miners established and in force shall govern the decision of actions as they do with us, so that you will give the property to the oldest possessor, so that you will give the mine to the discoverer? Will you establish that rule? Are you ready to say that in this litigation which has been had, if these people bring it up to the Supreme Court of the United States, they shall have the laws administered which they have established and by which that community has grown up? The Supreme Court of the United States has no authority to administer them until you pass an act to that effect. It has declared that it will not recognize these conventionalities.

Look at the effect of it. I have no doubt that Congress will pass some act whereby our titles will be secured to us. I have no doubt that when the subject is investigated it will be seen to be for the interest of the General Government to encourage mining and to pass such laws as will enable us to develop and open that vast country, a country that is almost unknown, and would now be entirely unknown but for the enterprise of these same miners whose rights are here to be ignored. But for them it would still be marked upon our maps as the unexplored region of America. Before you undertake to interfere with their prosperity in this way, you should pass some rules by which the Supreme Court can be governed.

But it may be said that if the Supreme Court shall dismiss the cases here because it has no jurisdiction, and shall not order the court below to dismiss them, it will merely leave the parties as they are. That, however, would not do the appellants any good; it would effect no good to anybody; but it would do this: it would be a public advertisement of one of the departments of the Government that the miners on the Pacific coast have no title, and it would tend to cast a shade over the enterprise of that whole country. You cannot imagine the vast harm a decision of that kind would do in stopping the progress of development in that country. The people there have invested their all and spent their lives, believing that Congress will, when it has the matter under consideration, do justice to their labors and do justice to their rights in discovering and opening and developing the mines; but if Congress will pass the subject over to the Supreme Court without any consideration on its part, without providing for protecting them, and will call upon the Supreme Court to apply an arbitrary rule, we shall have in effect all departments of the Government concurring in treating us as outlaws and trespassers. It will be done, of course unintentionally, by an indirect action placing the matter before the Supreme Court to declare a principle of law before Congress has acted to prescribe the law by which they shall be governed.

Now, I say that before a retrospective act, an act that is unprecedented, an act that interferes with vested rights as this undoubtedly will do, is passed by Congress to relieve certain parties, it should be clearly demonstrated that there is a demand for the act; it should be demanded by the citizens of that country. I may here state that this very question of having the Supreme Court of the United States pass upon our mining titles, before the passage of any law of Congress for the settlement of those titles, came before our people when the proposition to become a State and incur the burdens of a State was under discussion; and it was regarded by those who were most deeply interested in that country as highly important that this question of miners' titles should first be acted upon by Congress before it should go to the Supreme Court. We wanted to have State courts, so that we could have our local rules and regulations recognized by them as they have been for the last seventeen years. That was one strong argument for our becoming a State. But now, if you provide for dragging a few cases before the Supreme Court of the United States, and getting these injurious principles declared, and getting it advertised that there is no title in our country, that there are no rights there which are to be regarded, we shall have a panic in mining operations; we shall be placed back for a year or two; and, as we cannot expect to get any action of Congress this year, we shall have to go through a whole year with this cloud and this embarrassment, when every year is important to the development of the country if the present age is to realize anything from the vast mineral resources of the public lands.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate more than a few minutes in attempting to reply to the honorable member from Nevada. The principal question which the discussion involves is, to my mind, entirely free from doubt; and I say it after a careful examination of the authorities upon which the honorable member relies for the opposite opinion.

As to that portion of the amended bill to which he objects, which lessens the compensation that the clerk of the court shall receive under the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, I have nothing to say. If the compensation proposed by the committee is not an adequate compensation, the Senate can either alter it in that particular or it can be altered in some subsequent law.

I do not know that the Senate are now exactly advised of what the case is which demands, as I think, the interposition of Congress. In the act authorizing the Territory of Nevada, which was passed in 1861, a provision was made which is to be found in all territorial organizations, and one which Congress is obliged to make if it wishes to preserve quiet in the Territory; and to secure justice as between the individual suitors and justice as between the individual inhabitants of the United States, organizing courts, and authorizing those courts not to assume final jurisdiction in certain cases, but providing that their judgments, whatever they may be, in cases in which the amount is such as if they had occurred in the circuit courts of the United States, could have been carried by appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, shall be so brought up for review. The language of the ninth section of the act says:

"Writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of said supreme court [of the Territory] shall be allowed, and may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same regulations as from the circuit courts of the United States, where the value of the property, or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party or other competent witness, shall exceed $1,000."

Many of the cases involve amounts much beyond a thousand dollars, involve, as I understand, (for I have no knowledge of what the cases are, and I have of course no interest in them as counsel, or I would not be found speaking of the cases here,) an amount of millions, and are now in the Supreme Court upon appeals or writs of error prosecuted under the authority of the section to which I have just adverted. While they are pending in the Supreme Court Congress has admitted Nevada as a State, but by the act admitting her as a State into the Union, clothed with all the powers that the States of the Union have under the Constitution of the United States, omitted to provide that cases in the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of error or appeal from the territorial court should, notwithstanding the admission of the State, be heard. The counsel for the appellants—and I believe my friend who has just taken his seat appeared in that capacity in these cases—has moved the court—

Mr. STEWART. Allow me. I would state that I was counsel in all these cases, I believe, except one, in the court below. I was for the appellee here in one case, and in three cases I believe for the appellants. As I stated, I was situated in that way; but I am not counsel in this court, and have no further connection with any of that business.

Mr. JOHNSON. I knew the honorable member had been counsel below and I supposed he had followed the cases up here. The parties would hardly employ other counsel when they could have been so well represented by the honorable member himself; but by those who are associated as counsel in the cases a motion has been made to dismiss the appeals or writs of error, and upon this ground, that there could be no territorial courts after the Territory became a State in the Union; and they ceasing, in the absence of legislation providing for the case, the mandate which the Supreme Court would have sent to the territorial court, and to which as the law stood at the time the State was admitted the mandates could only go, could not be sent to any court, and that rendered it illegal in the Supreme Court to assume jurisdiction.

The question for us is whether, when we have authorized the territorial courts to exercise jurisdiction in the very cases which are now pending upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and when we have authorized these very cases to be brought by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, we will permit justice to be impeded or obstructed by our own omission to provide, at the period we received Nevada as a State into the Union, that these cases should, notwithstanding, be heard by the Supreme Court. But the honorable member tells us first, that an act of that description would be unconstitutional, and he refers to decisions in 9 and 10 Howard which he supposes establish that proposition. If the honorable member will pardon me for saying so, his view of them is an utter misapprehension of these decisions. The case in 9 Howard was not a case of appeal pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, and brought there properly by a law the validity of which nobody disputed, and where Congress provided that, notwithstanding the termination of the territorial court, the Supreme Court might continue to exercise jurisdiction which they had once obtained by a proper appeal, and in the exercise of that jurisdiction sent their mandates to such court as the legislation of Congress might prescribe, but an entirely different case. The State of Florida, after Florida ceased to be a Territory, undertook to give jurisdiction to the territorial courts of the United States, and the Supreme Court decided that there were no territorial courts of the United States; that necessarily the moment the State was admitted into the Union without reserving for any purpose the continuance of the territorial courts, as was done in that case, those courts went out of existence, and there was no authority in the State of Florida by any legislation of our own to create territorial courts; and that is all. There is not a syllable in the opinion of Mr. Justice Nelson, in that case, or in the subsequent one, to be found in 10 Howard, which intimates that Congress would not have the right in cases now pending in the Supreme Court, under the circumstances in which they are pending, to authorize the Supreme Court to go on and decide them, and it would be monstrous if it were otherwise.

The honorable member seems to assume that the decisions of the territorial courts were all right. How do we know that? How does the honorable member know it? What is the absolute confidence that he has in that opinion? The appeal taken shows that the parties prosecuting the appeal and acting under the advice of their own counsel thought that those decisions were erroneous, and the honorable member's endeavor to defeat the provision that the cases shall be heard rather implies a doubt that if they shall be heard the decisions of the court below will be reversed. What does the amendment propose? It does not place before the Supreme Court of the United States any opinion upon the part of the Senate that the judgments or decrees rendered in the court below are erroneous. It simply provides that they shall go on to hear and decide these cases, which are about now to drop because of our omission, to make provision for that fact in the law admitting Nevada into the Union. Is not that right? Was it right to authorize an appeal to the Supreme Court? Congress thought so, has ever thought so; and if it was right to authorize an appeal, is it not right to make that appeal effective? And what harm will the honorable member, or those whom he represents, his constituents, suffer if this provision should be adopted by the Senate? They will only have this injury inflicted upon them, if that can be considered an injury, that is to say, of losing the benefit of the judgments below if the Supreme Court shall be of opinion that the judgments below were erroneous. Ought the Senate of the United States, who are placed here for the very purpose of seeing that justice is administered, stop for a moment in deliberating whether they will not give to the citizens of Nevada, against whom these decrees or judgments have been pronounced, the opportunity of having their cases heard in the Supreme Court of the United States, which is given to the citizens of all the other States in the Union? To my mind—and I speak it with all possible respect to the honorable member from Nevada—it is a monstrous proposition.

As to the power to do it, I never before heard it doubted. Maryland has done it over and over again in cases precisely analogous. In Maryland and in some other of the States there are limited periods within which appeals must be prosecuted, and after the expiration of those periods cases have arisen where the Legislature of Maryland has thought it proper to make an exception, and to authorize the appellate court of Maryland to hear and decide them, and the authority to do so by the highest court in Maryland was held to be so clearly settled that they would not hear an argument upon the subject. That is all I propose to say upon the constitutional question.

It is said by the honorable member that rights are vested. Vested how? Vested, according to the assumption, because of the rendition by the court below of erroneous judgment; rights acquired because the court below, by mistake, has taken away rights that existed before; for, I repeat, if the rights maintained by the judgment of the court below are found by the Supreme Court to be rights, there is no inconvenience, there can be no divesting, because the judgment of the court below will stand affirmed; but if, on the contrary, the Supreme Court shall be of opinion that the judgments rendered in the court below were erroneous, then the Supreme Court will have decided only that this state of facts exists, that by the judgments of the court below property had been taken erroneously from one man to whom it belonged and given to another to whom it did not belong; and is it possible that the Senate of the United States can hesitate a moment in saying that if they have the power they will guard against such a palpable injustice?

Now, sir, a word as to the policy. The honorable member tells us that there are certain matters of policy that ought to regulate the deliberations of the Senate on this question. What are they? He says they have certain mining laws and usages; that these are known there and known nowhere else. That is a great mistake. If they are mining laws and usages that the parties had any authority to establish, the Supreme Court know them just as well as the territorial courts know them; and the bar of the Supreme Court (for that bar has members from the courts of the Pacific) understand them just as well as the members of the profession who advocated the cases in the court below and succeeded in obtaining these hypothetically erroneous judgments. Policy! If there be any policy, Mr. President, which the Congress of the United States should hold more especially dear than any other, it is to see that justice under the laws is administered, not under usages that are not laws, but under what the Constitution of the United States proclaims are the laws of the United States and the laws of the States in cases where the laws of the States are properly before the Supreme Court of the United States for adjudication. The very object of the organization of the tribunal is to produce uniformity of decision, so as to make the man in Maryland stand precisely upon the same footing as the man in Nevada, entitled to the same protection which the authority and the wisdom of that court it was supposed would always secure.

The honorable member tells us that he does not know that there have been any precedents of this kind. Why? Because the case for which we are providing was provided for in advance, or because there were no cases brought by appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States pending at the time when the State, formerly a Territory, was admitted into the Union.

I submit, then, without further detaining the Senate that, whether upon the ground of constitutional law or of high and enlightened policy, it is incumbent on the Senate to provide against the great injustice of having these cases disposed of without passing through the review of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I will say but a few words in reply to the Senator from Maryland. He assumes some very extraordinary positions. One is the presumption that the territorial courts have done wrong, and the presumption that the Congress of the United States in the act of admitting the State of Nevada into the Union also did wrong. Why, sir, who is asking for affirmative relief here? Who is asking for the Supreme Court of the United States to take into consideration and adjudicate these causes? The presumption is that the law as it now stands is right, until the contrary be shown; and I say that before a relief bill is passed—this is a relief bill, and its operation is simply to give the mine to the squatter, to the man who came last—before you pass a bill which shall produce such effects, it should be shown affirmatively that there is demand for it. It appears that Congress at the last session did not see any necessity for such legislation.

The Senator from Maryland says that the reason why there are no precedents for this measure is because there have heretofore been no cases of this kind. The case in the book right before him from Wisconsin was a case of the same kind, pending in the same manner in the Supreme Court here at the time the State was organized, and the Supreme Court held that it had no jurisdiction. Was not that a case like this? Did the parties there attempt to come before Congress and ask for relief? Never but once was such a thing provided for at the time of the admission of a State, that I am able to find, and that was in the case of Minnesota. There have been numerous other instances of the admissions of States where the provision has not been made and the Supreme Court did not presume to act, and one of those cases was right before the Senator at the time he made his statement that there were no cases of this kind in other instances to be acted upon.

The Senator says what they want is the administration of the law; that they want the Supreme Court to declare the law as it is; and that there are no questions of policy when right is involved. If you want the law as it is, take it as it is in these cases, and do not ask to change it. When you ask to change the law, you ask to change it for some question of policy or of right. The Senator says he asks for the law as it is. I say, let the Supreme Court administer the law as it is. I say there are injurious consequences to arise from having it administered in a different form from what it is. I say that passing this bill with the amendment of the committee will bring before the Supreme Court rules and regulations that they will not recognize. I say that bringing these cases before the Supreme Court in this manner is a declaration on the part of the Senate that they wish to have these rules and regulations ignored, because the Supreme Court must ignore them. These mines are situated on the public lands, and you say to the Supreme Court, by passing a special relief bill to bring these cases before it, "we will not provide for those who have settled upon the public lands any means by which they can get title; we will not recognize the right of prior possession or of discovery in the mines; we will ignore that, and call upon you to administer the rule which you have established in real estate cases where the parties have derived title from the Government; we will call upon you to give the land to the last possessor." These are the questions that come up.

The change proposed is wrong. It is asking for a wrong. It is asking to disturb a settled condition of things. There is nothing that appears here to show that any wrong has now been done, but I say there is a presumption in favor of the local courts. I differ from the Senator in this respect. There is a presumption in favor of all judicial tribunals that they have acted right; there is a presumption that these cases are already decided correctly; and there is a certainty that, without any rules being prescribed by Congress to govern them, the Supreme Court are not going to take the advance and do something that you will not do—declare that the rules and regulations of the miners shall prevail. Pass such a law—say that these cases, when they go before the Supreme Court, shall be governed by the local rules and regulations, and we have no objection. Say that hereafter the Federal courts, in adjudicating the rights of miners, shall be governed by the local rules; do not upturn the condition of things, and you may pass your bill without any objection from the Pacific coast. Provide that the discoverers shall be protected; provide that prior possession shall be a sufficient title, and we shall have no objection. But if you pass the provision as it is, in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court, the effect will be that they will treat these settlers and these miners as alien enemies, and drive them out, and give the property to him who has the strong hand. It is great injustice; and I say the change proposed, without providing at the same time rules by which the Supreme Court can be governed, will cause great trouble and confusion and embarrassment in carrying on the mining operations of that country. It will open up what it has cost five years to settle; it will open what it has cost millions to settle. You will destroy the vested rights in that country if you drag these cases before the Supreme Court, and let them again declare that the miner shall not recover in ejectment upon prior possession under the local rules, which they will declare now, unless in your law you establish equitable rules by which they shall be governed in adjusting cases as to mining titles.

Why can we not say what the Supreme Court will say in regard to the litigation in reference to mines on the public lands, neither party owning the title? Why need we be so anxious that the cases shall be heard? Why need the Senate be so anxious to place these cases now, where there is a rule that the last comer, who has got possession by force, shall hold it? I cannot see. The law as it was passed last winter was correct; that law met the desires and met the approval of the people of the State. There has been no complaint of it.

But it is asked here why the people there cannot have their rights. Sir, let me ask, who represent the people of Nevada? Who know best about the effect of a decision of this kind? Who is asking to have the settled condition of things upturned? Is it the people of Nevada? Are they asking you to destroy all the rules of decision by which they are governed? Put the question to the people of Nevada, and how would they decide it? They looked upon the privilege of governing their own local affairs in their own way as a great boon, and they supposed their settled rules on this question would be maintained until Congress established others. You have by your tacit action, by your tacit encouragement, allowed them to open and to enter up that country, to build up new States, to build up the Pacific coast, from which there has been a stream of gold and silver that has enriched the East. You have given them no rules of legislation whereby to be governed. They have made rules for themselves; and now will you have it said that the prior occupants shall not hold these mining claims according to the local law? If you send it to the Supreme Court to-day, that will be the decision. That is the effect of this provision. That is what we complain of. You say you do not want the local rules disregarded. Then pass a law that they shall not be disregarded, and there will be no objection to your bill. But, sir, I know how it will desolate the country that we represent to reopen the whole of these disputes, to declare that the local rules are not in force, to have them relitigated in the State courts, to declare that the last comer shall hold, to declare that we will send them to the courts to determine this matter without recognizing their local rules.

This question involves a great many considerations; and I do hope that the Senate will not pass this amendment at this time. Let it come up separately. Let it not be attached as a rider to a judicial bill. Let us have it referred to a committee. Let us take proof as to the necessity of it. Let it be examined. Let somebody ask for it who knows its effects. Do not, I say, pass the bill in this shape, and injure the country, when the people of Nevada do not ask for it. I have clients deeply interested in having this bill passed; more clients interested in having it passed than I have on the other side; but they admit to me that it will create ruin and disturbance, and disorganize our whole country, and they say to me, "You are acting right." Although two or three of them are urging the passage of this bill, they admit it is against the public good. Sir, I am here to represent, not a particular class, but the people of Nevada; and I know that if this bill passes, and we get a decision of the Supreme Court to the effect that we have no title there, that the local rules and regulations shall not govern, it will injure the State of Nevada materially.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I have no clients interested in this bill, and I have not the honor to represent the State of Nevada. The wants of that people are unquestionably much better known to the honorable Senators who represent that State so ably on this floor than they can be to me. This bill, however, came from the House of Representatives, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I chance to be a member. The bill, in the committee, was committed to my charge; it was reported to the Senate; and that explains my connection with it.

The honorable Senator suggests that we pass the bill organizing the courts in Nevada, but leave out anything in relation to causes now pending, or to those which have already been decided in the territorial courts, until a separate bill has been brought in upon that subject, referred to a committee, and examined by the committee. I can assure the honorable Senator that these questions were examined by the Committee on the Judiciary, and very fully examined. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] will bear me witness, especially in regard to this feature of the bill authorizing appeals and writs of error to be taken from the territorial courts, which, since the State has been admitted into the Union, have judicially expired. The committee thought that it was not just to parties who had been litigating causes in those territorial courts that they should not have the same rights of hearing on appeal and writ of error as they would have had if these courts had been created when the Territory of Nevada was admitted into the Union as a State. The fact that Congress did not at that time create those courts was an omission, an inadvertence on the part of Congress; it was a wrong to the people of that Territory. They were entitled under the Constitution and laws of the United States to the protection of that Constitution and those laws just as the people of every other Territory when admitted into the Union as a State are entitled. To deny it to them seemed to the Committee on the Judiciary to be a wrong; and therefore it was deemed not only just, but necessary, that we should provide not only for the causes that were now pending in the Supreme Court, but also for those causes which had been decided in the territorial courts from which appeals and writs of error had not yet been taken. I do not propose to add to the argument of the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] in regard to the power of Congress over the subject, or the expediency or the justice of exercising it. Nothing said by the honorable Senator from Nevada, either in his opening remarks or in his reply to the Senator from Maryland, has made it necessary, in my opinion, for me to add, if I could add, anything to what the Senator from Maryland had previously said.

If, however, we were to examine the question of constitutionality, how should we stand if we followed the advice of the honorable Senator from Nevada? Why, sir, we should reject this bill; we should, therefore, cut off the parties now in the Supreme Court from all opportunity to be heard; and we should effectually prevent those whose causes have been decided in the territorial courts from ever having their causes reexamined, however manifest may be the errors committed or the injustice done in the court below.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator from Connecticut will excuse me, I omitted to refer to the report read by me. I think the Senator from Maryland was very much mistaken in his remark that there was nothing in these reports bearing upon the point. On the contrary, they are directly in point. They decide this proposition clearly: that it is not in the power of Congress to give to the Supreme Court of the United States any of the State jurisdiction. They decide further that it is not in the power of Congress to make a State court the successor of the Supreme Court of the United States for a case not of Federal jurisdiction; and Mr. Justice Nelson gives an intimation that a proposition like this would be unconstitutional. I would like to reply to that position. At the time Wisconsin was admitted into the Union, the case of McNulty against Batty was pending in the Supreme Court. It was claimed that an act that was passed after the admission of Florida retained the jurisdiction and provided for those cases already commenced to come to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was claimed that that law was in point; that it was equivalent to saying that the United States courts should finally dispose of all causes that were then pending. They contended that the proper construction of the law was the same as the law that is sought to be passed here. The Supreme Court first held that the law did not cover the case, because the case of McNulty against Batty was pending in the Supreme Court at the time of the admission of the State, and consequently the law did not apply; but if it did apply, if it had said in so many words that the Supreme Court should go on and determine the causes pending in that court at the admission of the State, Mr. Justice Nelson says they do not wish to be understood that such an act would be constitutional. He says:

"In placing the want of jurisdiction, however, upon this ground, we must not be understood as admitting that if the provisions of the Florida act of the 22d of February, 1847, applied to the case, the jurisdiction could be upheld."

That is to say, if it was an act analogous to the one now under consideration—

"for, if we are right in the conclusion that, even assuming the record had in the case been transferred from the territorial to the district court of the State, our jurisdiction would still be incomplete and ineffectual, inasmuch as that court possessed no power to carry the mandate into execution, the case not being one of Federal jurisdiction, the result would be the same as that at which we have arrived."

It is the same as saying if you pass an act here making a State court the successor of the Supreme Court in a case of State jurisdiction it is ineffectual, because the Supreme Court of the United States has no means of carrying the mandate into execution. It cannot send it to a State court and ask it to execute matters of its own jurisdiction. It must execute matters of its own jurisdiction on its own motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe the honorable Senator read from that case previously what he has now read, and gave his views to the Senate in respect to the meaning of the Supreme Court and the principles enunciated by them in that opinion. The honorable Senator from Maryland replied and gave his views; and it seems those two honorable Senators differ very widely in their construction of that case. I put it to the Senate—suppose as between these two distinguished lawyers the Senate are to decide; is it not much safer that we decide as the Senator from Maryland suggests rather than as the Senator from Nevada suggests?

and for this reason: if the Senator from Nevada should happen to be wrong, and we at his instance refuse to pass this bill, these parties suffer wrong, without the possibility of redress; we put an end to any hope that their causes can ever be heard by any tribunal. On the other hand, suppose the honorable Senator from Maryland chances to be wrong, if we pass the bill are these parties injured? No; because these causes all arise in the Supreme Court, where the parties can properly be heard on this very question, and as the honorable Senator says he has a decision of the Supreme Court to sustain him in the position he assumes the Supreme Court would at once dismiss the causes for want of jurisdiction. There would be no danger then that the parties to these suits would suffer any wrong whatever; they would have their day in court; and the Supreme Court are exceedingly disposed to stand by their own precedents and their own decisions. Let the parties go there, therefore; let them be heard, and heard there, where, as the honorable Senator says, there is a decision against them staring them in the face; there is no danger that the court will establish any new principle or do any injustice. On the other hand, if we refuse to let the cases be heard at all, the honorable Senator suggests if it should turn out that he is wrong, and he will pardon me for supposing it is possible that he may be, the wrong done is irremediable. Upon that distinct proposition, therefore, it seems to me there is a clear path for the Senate to follow, if they would do justice upon this question; and that is, let the parties be heard; do not say they shall not be heard; let them be heard, and let us believe that justice will be done.

Then, Mr. President, upon the other more important question, that is, the fees of the district clerk and the district attorney of Nevada, the honorable Senator says that the expenses of living, the cost of transportation, &c., are much greater in Nevada than in other States, and the fees and salaries should be proportionately higher. We give to the district judge of the State $3,500, the amount in the bill as it came from the House; and I will say to the honorable Senator that the judge, in my own district, with a salary but little more than half of that, performs more labor, sits more days in a year in court, as I believe, performing judicial duties, than every district judge on the Pacific slope all taken together. He is also a judge who could command at the bar, and would receive if at the bar a very large professional income, five times as great at the very least as his salary as judge. These offices of district attorney and district clerk and marshal, it is true, are somewhat important with reference to the administration of justice; but it is not very difficult, ordinarily, to procure persons to fill those offices. I do not believe there will be any difficulty in filling them in Nevada, and I do not believe it, among other things, for this reason: that the honorable Senator presses upon the Senate the importance of our legislating so that there shall be but one clerk for both courts. If the compensation is so small that it is impossible to get anybody that is competent to take the office, is there any danger lest there should be two men appointed? The danger is that nobody can be found to take the office; and yet the honorable Senator asks us to depart from the law universally existing elsewhere in the country giving to the district judge the power to appoint the clerk of his court, and the circuit judge to appoint the clerk of his court, and so by law require the clerk of the one court to be the clerk of the other. If it is impossible to get men to fill these several offices in consequence of the compensation there will be no necessity for that legislation, for the two judges will have to agree on one man and appoint him, if indeed they can find any one man who will consent to take the office and perform the duty. The fact that such legislation is deemed necessary by the honorable Senator is, as it seems to me, a good reason why there is no need now of doubling the compensation. If there is need to legislate so as to prevent two men from being clerks, it is apparent there are men enough there who are willing to accept the place and perform the duties.

Why, sir, the members of the profession, as the honorable Senator well knows, are patriotic and self-sacrificing everywhere. I am persuaded that any one of the younger members of the bar in Nevada, rather than that the court should be embarrassed in the performance of its duties, would volunteer to perform the duties of clerk even without compensation; such is the patriotism of the profession. We who are members of it know this to be the fact. The other members of the Senate who have had the fortune to belong to other professions, or to be connected with other walks of life, may not feel the force of this argument, but all members of the profession know it to be true. There is no danger, therefore, that these duties will not be performed, and well performed. There is no necessity, then, to clog this bill with any extra compensation to the clerk, or to the district attorney, or to the marshal. I hope the Senate will pass this bill with the amendments as they came from the committee; and I surely will not stand longer in the way of a vote upon the question.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is a somewhat remarkable fact, or at least a fact worthy of being remarked, that we all know a great deal more about what is east of us toward sunrise than we know what is west of us. A man who never crossed the Alleghenies does not know the valley of the Mississippi. We remember that when Mr. Calhoun went to Memphis for the first time he found the Mississippi to be a great inland sea. The gentleman from Connecticut speaks of a judge in his State. Why, sir, in the port of San Francisco in the admiralty court and circuit court for that State there is more business done than there is in Massachusetts and Connecticut put together. There is a larger commerce there, involving more extended, more particular, and more difficult interests than belong to any of the old-settled communities on this side of the mountains.

I make that remark en passant, for it is true that our interests on the other side of the Sierra Nevada and beyond the Rocky mountains are almost as much excluded as if Mr. Benton had his invocation realized when he said he would place upon the topmost summit of the Rocky mountains a monument to the god Terminus, and say, "Thus far shall we go, and no further;" we are almost as much excluded in consideration here. It is assumed by persons who have never been beyond the Alleghenies that they understand the interests of the plains and mountains and the coast of the Pacific.

The bill as it came from the House of Representatives in my judgment was a proper bill. The sixth section of the amendment is just legislation. I agree with the Senator from Connecticut in that respect. It, however, should not at this time have disturbed legislation. I do not agree with my friend from Nevada that we have not the power to carry causes from the courts of the recent Territory of Nevada. I think that the rights of those citizens at the time of the enactment of the law making it a State were rights entitled to a hearing by appeal in the Supreme Court of the United States. By, I think, faulty legislation those rights rest in abeyance and may at any time be extended to them. It is their right to demand them and they should be extended to them by legislation. I do not think, however, that this is a proper way to do it, and am clearly of opinion that the bill as it came from the House should be passed substantially as it is. I would like to amend it by adding this sixth section, as it is a just one; but I would not move the amendment because it may interfere with the passage of the bill. I do not propose to make a speech on this subject. I only wish to express my opinion. That what is put in here by way of amendment as the sixth section is a proper piece of legislation, I do not doubt; but I do not think it should be attached to this measure at the present time. But I desire to express my opinion with regard to this matter of compensation. In the State which the gentleman from Connecticut represents, a man can live, and live well, for one fourth of what a man can live in the same way for in Nevada. The cost of transportation of subsistence itself would be four times the cost of the production in the State of Connecticut. In all mining countries this is to a greater or less extent true; but it is particularly so in that State. They have no agricultural lands; they have but little pasturage. A great deal of the stock that they consume has to be driven on foot for four hundred or five hundred miles. Many of their vegetables are transported from one hundred and seventy-five to two hundred miles, and across a mountain range that reaches an altitude of seven thousand feet. All these things go into the necessary expense of living; and to live comfortably there will cost at least quadruple the cost of living in any one of the New England States.

I think the bill as it came from the House of Representatives is correct. I regretted to see the amendments put on by the Committee on the Judiciary. The sixth section reported by the committee I regard as a just provision; but if it incumbers the bill and endangers its passage I hope it will be rejected. If it shall then be brought in as a separate bill, it will receive my hearty support.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POWELL in the chair.) The question will be on the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary to strike out the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth sections of the bill and to insert two other sections in lieu thereof.

Mr. STEWART called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called) said: I am in favor of the first section reported by the Committee on the Judiciary and am opposed to the other section, and consequently, as the vote is to be taken on both together, I cannot vote at all.

The result was then announced—yeas 22, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Riddle, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Willey, and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Dixon, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Richardson, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I will inquire if the sections which have just been adopted are still open to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will be in the Senate. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to offer an additional section to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be in order to offer an additional section to the bill. It would not be in order to amend the sections just adopted until we get into the Senate. If the bill be reported to the Senate, the Senator will have an opportunity to move his amendment in the Senate, as well as now.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended. Mr. McDOUGALL. As we are now in the Senate, I desire to move that the section marked as the sixth section be made the ninth section, and the ninth section be made the tenth section.

Mr. FOOT. It is not yet in order. The question now is on concurring in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole. Then it will be in order for any Senator to move an additional section.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to say a solitary word in explanation of my vote. As regards the compensation provided by the amendment of the committee to the different officers that are designated in their amendment, although I am not entirely satisfied that it is just and politic in relation to the officers in this new State, still I would not be disposed to dissent from the proposition of the committee; but upon the point of permitting the Supreme Court to keep its jurisdiction of the cases that have come up from Nevada while it was a Territory, I entertain a serious objection. As stated by the Senator from Nevada, when the Supreme Court decides that class of cases it does it upon this general principle, that it recognizes no property in the lands which may be the subject-matter of those suits in either of the parties. I think that would be unjust to the State of Nevada, to the interests of the State and of the people who have proceeded to that country and settled it and developed their mining interests. In relation to all the older States this principle prevails: that the laws of the States and the adjudications of the supreme courts of the United States are recognized and conformed to by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the State of Nevada there was not and could not necessarily be any legitimate and obligatory code of laws in regard to the whole of the mining interest, and yet a mining country could not be settled, and the operations of mining carried on with anything like order or security for the length of time that such has been the case in that and other mining countries on the Pacific coast, without some system of laws regulating the mines, the proprietorship, and the title to the mines, and the rights of the various persons who take possession of them. These matters have become the subject of usage, of comity, and of a code of laws that have been adopted without any sufficient authority, but still with the perfect concurrence of the people of the mining countries; and under this system of laws, thus established, the interests and the rights of the persons in possession of the mines have been recognized and adjudicated upon by their territorial courts.

Now, if those cases are brought up to the Supreme Court, that court repudiates entirely this system of laws arising from comity, from usage, from necessity, established by the common sanction and consent of the whole mining population, and the rights of parties to the suits are decided irrespective of this code of laws that has thus been built up, and upon which the rights of the miners have been regulated, have been passed from vendor to purchaser, and have been adjudged by the territorial courts. It seems to me this would introduce a great deal of confusion and a great deal of injustice and wrong among the miners of Nevada. It seems to me, if Congress has the option in refusing to adopt this amendment to sustain this system of laws that have thus been built up in Nevada, and of recognizing the principles adjudicated by its courts upon this system of laws and upon which the rights of miners have been settled and adjudicated there and have passed in the course of will, by descent and by purchase, that Congress so far as it may recognize, ought to recognize the existence of that code of laws and of the rights that have grown up under it. Being of that opinion, being of the opinion that it is a question of expediency, of policy, as the Senator from Nevada said, that all the claims of order, of justice, of abstract right, are in favor of acquiescing in the system of laws established by those miners and in the judgments which the courts of that Territory have passed upon them, and in all the rights that have grown up under them, I think it would be most conformable to justice and to wise legislation that this bill should not pass in a form authorizing the Supreme Court to continue a jurisdiction that would result in the repudiation of that system of laws, and in all the rights that have grown up under it. Therefore, sir, although I should be in favor of the fifth section of the amendment of the committee I am entirely opposed to the policy and justice of the sixth section.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HALE. I observe that the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Kentucky both assume, as a matter settled beyond controversy, that if these cases come up before the Supreme Court they will entirely disregard these local laws. I want to ask where is the authority for that assertion? I ask for information. I do not cavil at it.

Mr. STEWART. The authority for it is found in a case from Oregon, in which the court declared that until Congress made some provision for the disposition of the public lands, or until some law of Congress was passed under which title could be obtained to them, they would disregard any possession upon the public lands or any right upon them in either party. I wish now, Mr. President, to offer the following amendment, as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That in actions respecting mining claims the rules, customs, and regulations of miners shall be regarded as law and enforced by the courts of the United States: Provided, This shall not be so construed as to affect in any wise the right or ownership of the United States to the same.

I would like to perfect the language of this proposition a little more. I have hardly had time to draw it up. I will ask that the bill be laid over, so that I may offer a provision to remedy a difficulty that will be apparent to all Senators, of having these cases adjudicated without bringing into requisition those local rules and regulations; because this bill provides for bringing up a large number of cases, all the litigation for the last five years, for the limitation on them does not lapse for five years, and there is a great mass of litigation there. If they are to be determined in the Supreme Court without applying these rules and regulations, the man who has force enough to hold possession, the last comer, the man in possession, will remain there under these decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does he mean to be understood that it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that in an action of ejectment prior occupancy is not a sufficient right?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir, I do.

Mr. COLLAMER. Did they ever decide so?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir, in repeated decisions; and that is the trouble.

Mr. COLLAMER. I must confess I do not understand it. I suppose that in the cases where such decisions were made the parties were all wrong; they were all without right.

Mr. STEWART. It may be all wrong, but it is the law, and we have got to be governed by it. It is the thing I want to avoid. Allow me to read the syllabus in the case of Lownsdale vs. Parrish, 21 Howard, page 290:

"Congress passed no law in any wise affecting title to lands in the Territory of Oregon until September, 1850; and therefore where a controversy arose, in July, 1850, relating to titles to land, neither party could be said to have a legal title."

"Consequently, the amount in controversy could not be ascertained so as to bring the case within the jurisdiction of this court; and there is no question arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States so as to give jurisdiction."

And they go on in the opinion and reason it all out. This was an action for damages for injury to the possession.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am talking about an action of ejectment.

Mr. STEWART. I will state for the information of the Senate that most of the actions for mining claims are brought for trespass.

Mr. COLLAMER. Is there a case in any court in the world in which they disturbed a man in possession on the claim of another man who had no right? Was there ever such a decision made?

Mr. STEWART. They have refused a remedy, which is equivalent to it.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator from Vermont this question: suppose a miner has been in possession five years, and a wrong-doer or a number of wrong-doers go and turn him out with the strong hand, and are in possession themselves, what remedy has that miner?

Mr. COLLAMER. He can bring his action of ejectment to the court.

Mr. DAVIS. Why, he is a trespasser.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is immaterial. I apprehend that prior occupancy is always sufficient against a trespasser.

Mr. DAVIS. But both were trespassers.

Mr. COWAN. An outstanding title from the United States would be a good defense.

Mr. STEWART. It would be a good defense in the Supreme Court of the United States, but we have not allowed it to be set up. We rely on the prior possession always. We give the title to the prior occupant. I will read a passage from the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Burgess vs. Gray, 16 Howard, page 65:

"And the mere possession of public land, without title, will not enable the party to maintain a suit against any one who enters on it; and more especially he cannot maintain it against persons holding possession under title derived from proper officers of the Government. He must first show a right in himself before he can call into question the validity of theirs."

I do not believe a case can be found where a party has been allowed to recover on prior possession alone in the Supreme Court of the United States. The rule in ejectment is that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title.

Mr. COLLAMER. The particular form of action may come up, but I undertake to say that in the whole history of this world there cannot be found a decision of a court that would not sustain a man in his title by prior occupancy against a wrong-doer without title.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator a question. In the case I put—

Mr. COLLAMER. I have answered that case. He would have an action—

Mr. DAVIS. Let me put my question, and then the Senator can answer it. In the case I put, suppose the prior occupant of the mine brings an action against the man who enters upon him, and the defendant in the action of ejectment shows an outstanding title in the United States, would not that defeat the recovery of the plaintiff in the case?

Mr. COLLAMER. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS. That is the law of my State.

Mr. COLLAMER. If I am in peaceable and quiet possession of land another person has no right to eject me or turn me out of possession, and when I bring my action against him turn around and say, "John Styles owns the land." That is none of his business.

Mr. DAVIS. Why, Mr. President, there is not a case decided in the State of Kentucky, in which the question ever came up, that the judgment of the court was not that where the defendant in possession, who has been sued, shows an older outstanding title and the right to enter in a third person, that it did not defeat the action of ejectment; and Runninton, and Adams, and other English authorities upon the action of ejectment establish the same principle.

Mr. COLLAMER. According to that idea, if I understand the gentleman, if I find my brother Davis in possession of a piece of land and I ascertain that John Styles owns that land, and I go and turn my brother Davis out, and he brings an action of ejectment against me, I may turn around and say to him "It was John Styles's land." He would then ask me: "Did he give you the right to enter?" "No; I never had any under John Styles." What business have I to turn you out because John Styles owns the land, unless I get John Styles's right? Certainly there is no law in that.

Mr. DAVIS. It is upon this principle: that no two trespassers have a right legally to litigate the title of land between themselves.

Mr. COLLAMER. Prior occupancy is always a right against strangers.

Mr. STEWART. I will ask that this matter lie over. I should like to perfect a section of this kind which shall secure the rights of the miners.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir; I will not occupy any time now in debate upon it.

Mr. FOSTER. I really hope the bill will not be postponed. At this stage of the session postponement is equivalent to defeat. It is designed on the part of the Senator to defeat the bill I submit he had better avow it. If it is not, if he wishes to amend it, certainly there can be no objection to any amendment that shall require the Supreme Court to decide according to law and right in every case. I am not so afraid that the Supreme Court will outrage law, justice, and propriety, as the gentlemen seems to be; but if there is danger of it, I am by no means opposed to any amendment that shall require the court to observe all proper rules. The Senator has certainly not thought of this subject to-day for the first time. Ever since the honorable Senators from Nevada took their seats here, this bill has been pending. We are now getting toward the close of the session; and I repeat again that the Supreme Court has decided that these causes shall not be postponed beyond the 27th instant, as their session terminates on the 3d of March for the hearing of arguments. If this bill, therefore, can be kept along so that by going to the other House action upon it may be deferred until after the 27th, every gentleman that desires—

Mr. STEWART. With the permission of the Senator I will withdraw my motion and will ask to have my amendment considered as it is now presented. I think it is in form.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the amendment be read as it now stands.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That in actions respecting mining claims the rules, customs, and regulations of miners, shall be regarded as law and enforced by the courts of the United States: Provided, This shall not be so construed as to affect in any wise the right or ownership of the mines by the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. This is an important question.

Mr. COLLAMER. If the gentleman will indulge me a moment, I desire to suggest an amendment to the last clause of the amendment by adding the words "or those claiming under them."

Mr. STEWART. I accept that modification.

Mr. FOSTER. I certainly have no disposition to interfere with what may be—

Mr. CONNESS. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. President, this is a very important subject, particularly the point now under discussion, and it is too important to be decided hastily. The question involved in the whole bill before the Senate, that of continuing the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in cases involving mining property, is one of the deepest interest to the people occupying the mining Territories and States; it involves an immense amount of property. The Senate has decided, by the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary of this body, that they will continue the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States. Then, in the further consideration of this bill, that decision of the Senate is to be considered as having been fully accomplished. The question now involved arises from the objection made by those who opposed the passage of the amendment of the Judiciary Committee in this: that it was obnoxious because, upon questions of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, where a fee simple title was not in either party, plaintiff or defendant, the Supreme Court of the United States would not take jurisdiction, but would dismiss a cause of that character, and thereby leave this great mining interest exposed to the effect of a declaration by the highest tribunal in our land that there was no title but in the United States—a fact, it is true; but a fact which, if declared in that form, must have the most serious effect upon the value of mining property now owned over the length and breadth of the land.

What is aimed at now by the honorable Senator from Nevada is this: that since the jurisdiction of the Federal courts is to be continued by an act of Congress there shall be such a provision adopted as shall put that question at rest and give jurisdiction by this act to the Supreme Court of the United States, which jurisdiction shall be exercised notwithstanding there is no fee simple title in either party to the cause, but in accordance with the rights of priority of possession which may exist in either party, plaintiff or defendant. I submit that unless you do this you strike the severest blow at the mining interest of this country. It will be remembered by the Senate that our people, precipitated on these wild lands, have no opportunity under the laws of the United States to obtain title from the Government. They therefore, by permission of the Government, take possession. The local sentiment and opinion of the American people who seek thus to establish industry, community, and society, respects in all cases priority of possession. If you, sir, take up a mining claim, you being the first party to take it up, and prosecute your labor upon it, the community recognizes your first right as against any subsequent claimant. The local courts have taken up that opinion and they have declared it law; and upon just that basis and on that local recognition the entire mining property in the Pacific States and Territories rests. This, it will be remembered, is a very insecure foundation for the investment of millions upon millions of dollars.

Now, then, we ask in addition, that if you pass this bill as the Senate have now amended it, you shall incorporate in it a provision which, continuing the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, shall require that court to keep and retain the jurisdiction and decide according to that priority of possession. I do not altogether like the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Nevada. I think we are hardly prepared at this time to declare by a statute of the United States that all local mining rules and regulations shall be law, because—and the honorable Senator will bear me out in that—the local rules and regulations are as multifarious, as numerous, as different, and as many as there are localities and communities; and it would be a pretty broad declaration to incorporate into a statute of the United States that all this mass shall be law. You would have a contrariety of law which even a Philadelphia lawyer, as the expression is, would fail to comprehend or understand. There would be complications, I apprehend, impossible to reconcile or to be made understood.

The simple point needed, as I have before said, is to require the Supreme Court of the United States, when taking jurisdiction, to recognize the rule of priority of possession upon which all investments in those countries rest. Therefore I think this is a matter of too much importance to be hurried through, as asked for by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, and time should be given to prepare a section to cover this important point. I have hurriedly written at my desk—I will read it for the information of Senators—what it appears to me would cover the case; and yet not belonging to the legal profession I have no pretensions that I can sufficiently do this thing. I will read this, however, which I suggest as an additional section, so that at least what I mean shall be understood:

And be it further enacted, That in all cases which shall, by the provisions of this act, come within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, such jurisdiction shall not be lost by reason of the parties, plaintiff and defendant, not having title in fee simple, but such jurisdiction shall be exercised in conformity to priority of possession.

If the legal gentlemen in the Senate will say that that will cover the point, or will prepare another section that will sufficiently contain the same provision, it will be acceptable to me. But, sir, to confer this jurisdiction, and to reopen causes settled and determined, to disturb rights of property which are recognized, and subject causes involving them to be dismissed from the Supreme Court, because there is a want of title in neither party to the suit, I submit would be as destructive to us as though a tornado should pass over every inch of the surface of our country. I will send this amendment up to the desk and let gentlemen examine it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think with the honorable members from the Pacific States that it is very desirable there should be some legislation by Congress for the protection of those rights; but as far as I am advised they have been sufficiently protected. The Supreme Court of the United States may have, perhaps, decided erroneously in some cases in relation to those rights, and the effect of those rights in the cases that have been before them, but as far as the Government of the United States is concerned I do not know that they have ever interfered with any mining title.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to say one word right here, which will enable him at least to understand me?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. No case involving mining questions of the character here contemplated and now discussed that I am aware of has come to the Supreme Court of the United States, because California began as a State and Oregon was a State before mines were discovered in it, and our mines outside of those two States exist in land which is organized into Territories of the United States. Therefore you are now for the first time providing for continuing the jurisdiction involving mining cases from a Territory just organized and made into a State to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the question involved comes up for the first time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was aware of that, Mr. President. What I said was that as far as the decisions of the Supreme Court are concerned there has been no interference with those mining rights; and the honorable member is correct in saying that, except remotely, the nature and validity of those rights have not come in question in any case before that tribunal. But as I have stated, I concur with the members from the Pacific and from the States and Territories in which those mines are to be found that it is desirable there should be some legislation by Congress; but to legislate now upon a subject of that description, and particularly to legislate as the honorable member from Nevada proposes, by the adoption of the amendment which he has sent to the Chair, seems to me to be in the highest degree impolitic and erroneous. Those mining usages are almost as various as are the men engaged in the mining. They are one thing in one section, another thing in another section. They are changing from day to day, or from week to week. There is nothing stable in them.

Mr. CONNESS. Let me suggest to the Senator at this point that in many instances there is no record of those local laws; they are merely traditional. In other instances there are records.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was aware of that, and I was about to state it. There is not only in point of fact a great diversity of rule and regulation and usage, but there is, as the honorable member from California informs me, no record evidence of what those rules and usages are. Now what does the honorable member from Nevada propose? That the usages and customs of mining throughout the States in which mines are to be found are to govern the courts of the United States in passing judgment. What do you mean to say? Govern when? Are they to govern the controversy, such of them as exist at the time the controversy commences? Is the title claimed in the suit to be maintained or defeated by usages existing at the time the title was acquired? Or is the Supreme Court of the United States, if the case should come before the Supreme Court of the United States, to affirm or reverse it upon usages or customs adopted, not only after the title in the controversy may have been acquired, but after the decision of the court below may have been rendered? It certainly must appear to the Senate wholly improper, unexampled, and unjust in practical operation to adopt an amendment of that description.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not understand the Senator as holding that the amendment I offered and the views I presented are obnoxious to those objections.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was not replying to the proposition of the honorable member in that particular, but it was to the amendment of the member from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] and that is the only amendment before the Senate. The subject is quite an interesting one, not only to the States in which this property is to be found, but to the United States. It presents very complicated questions. It requires a great deal of practical knowledge and a great deal of theoretical scientific knowledge. What the usages should be, or whether it is possible to adapt usages to act uniformly throughout these mining interests, is a matter that requires a good deal of meditation. The idea of legislating now upon this subject, at this period of the session, in a bill of this kind, the purpose of which, as far as the particular section is concerned, is merely to say that the Supreme Court of the United States is to decide the cases before it as if the State of Nevada had not been introduced into the Union, seems to me highly improper, obviously improper.

I suggest to the honorable member from Nevada that he had better withdraw his amendment, and that he and the Representatives from those States, if no others will engage in it, should, in the interval between now and the next meeting of Congress, determine upon some system which is to have the force of law throughout these mining regions. It would be, I admit, exceedingly hard, when these mining possessions have been taken by the explorers, or, as they are termed in that country, the prospectors, and after they have given time and money and labor to the development of the mining interests, that the property should be taken from them by the United States or by any party claiming by the United States; but it is equally improper, if not more grossly improper, if I may be permitted to use such an expression, to say that persons who have rights, and that the law assumes, are not to have those rights passed upon by the law in force, whatever that may be, by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The honorable member from California thinks it would be wrong to have these cases decided by the courts of the United States upon rules known only to the common law. That does not arise under this bill. This bill, so far as the particular provision is concerned, applies only to cases in the Supreme Court of the United States. There are no territorial courts now in the State of Nevada; they have expired by operation of law; that is to say, by the bringing of the Territory as a State into the Union. That, upon the authority of the decision cited by the honorable member from Nevada, terminates in the territorial tribunals.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know whether I fully comprehend and understand the purpose aimed at by the Senators who represent the mining region; but I desire to state as briefly as I can what I think, with due deference to them and to the Senate, will be the necessary legislation to secure the rights of discoverers in these mines. We have had this question presented in the western States and the decisions that Senators have referred to, and on the same points to which they have referred. It was decided that where a man went on and made improvements upon the public lands, and left his home for the time being, and somebody else entered upon it, he could not recover possession of it for the reason that he had no title to it, just as the miners who leave for the time being their mines may be dispossessed. We passed through the Legislature of Illinois an act granting a possessory right, to enable the first settler to recover the land. That act enabled the first settlers to do another thing, which is a very important question involved or hereafter to be involved in this mining region: it enabled them where they sold their claims, as they were then termed, upon the public lands to recover the consideration, the money agreed to be paid, or the value of the property. In my judgment, the first legislation required from Congress in reference to this subject is to confer a possessory right upon the first discoverer. Confer that right upon him and he can take care of himself, and you will give protection to the adventurers who go out and discover your gold mines.

As regards the proposition now before the Senate, I have only to say that, in my judgment, it would not be wise to adopt the provisions made by each settlement in that country as the law of the land. You want uniformity in your laws. If you adopt that you have got this other question to decide: where they come in conflict, how far the jurisdiction of one mining company extends, over what territory, and, when you have decided that they have jurisdiction, which one first adopted the laws in reference to this matter. It seems to me you avoid all this difficulty by conferring a possessory right upon the individual who makes the discovery. I have not had my attention directed to this matter for a long number of years; but if I remember aright, we protected, in the State of Illinois, so far as we could protect, the first settler, and I imagine in all the western States, by the Legislature passing acts giving the first settler the possessory right. There is a necessity, however, in this instance of passing it by Congress, because the States do not own the land; they have not the fee simple, they have not the title; it is in the General Government, and the law ought to be uniform. It seems to me a simple proposition by which you confer this right would secure all that the Senators from the Pacific coast seek to accomplish.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I find myself embarrassed in deciding how I ought to vote upon this question. The proposition of the committee, that appeals shall be allowed from the judgment of the territorial court to the Supreme Court upon its face seems very right and proper, and I dislike to vote against a proposition having such apparent fairness and propriety; but, on the other hand, there is some difficulty about it. It is very certain that the Government of the United States has refused, by the policy which it has pursued for a number of years, to give to the miner a title to the property which he is improving. At first, this was not of very much importance, for the miner sought the streams, and picked up what gold he could; but that sort of mining has almost passed away; and now to develop the mineral resources of that great region requires the investment of large capital. The quartz mining must be prosecuted by the use of very expensive machinery. It is certainly the policy of the Government now that these mines shall not only be developed as rapidly as they have in the past, but that we shall encourage their development. The States of Nevada and California, as I understand, as States recognize the usages of the miners as the law governing the particular case that may come before the courts.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me for a single instant to say a word on that point?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. There has been no local legislation in those States on the subject; but the courts from the beginning have adopted, and finally it has become settled as the rule of decision that the priority of possession in every case shall determine the case, and those who acquire a right from the prior possessor are in every such case, by the courts, determined to be the owners of the property. There is no decision there based upon statute law, but a rule of decision, universal now in its character, and recognized, and upon which all these rights of property rest, has grown up based upon the right of original discovery and possession; and in the class of cases now pending and proposed to be continued in the Supreme Court, from Nevada, the Supreme Court would only deal with the record sent up to them, the court below having determined the causes by those rules of priority of possession. Therefore it is by the common law and the use of it by the courts that those decisions have been arrived at, and it is upon that basis that all our rights of property rest. There has been no local legislation on the subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not intend the Senate to understand me as saying that there had been local legislation; but I intended to say that those States through their courts recognize the usages of the miners.

Mr. CONNESS. They do.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I said a few minutes ago that in the first instance it was not a very important question, for the occupancy of the miner was not very permanent. A number of men found themselves in a particular neighborhood; they could acquire no title to any portion of the mineral lands; and so as a necessity of their condition they adopted certain usages. They agreed among themselves how much of the mineral lands should be occupied by each other; what should be the evidence of that occupancy; if a man were absent for a day or week from the particular spot of earth in which he was digging for gold, what evidence he should leave behind him that he was the occupant of that particular spot; and the courts, to some extent of necessity, recognizing these usages of the miners. Are Senators prepared to say in the absence of legislation by Congress that these usages agreed upon among the miners were not proper to be adopted, and that there was not some show of reason, to say the least of it, on the part of the courts in recognizing those usages as governing the men themselves?

Now, sir, when the mining operations have come to the point where to develop the mines requires the use of large capital this becomes a very grave question, and as I have said, before the courts of the States these usages are recognized, and as between the men engaged in mining the possession of the miner is his right. Has not the Government of the United States to some extent recognized this? Certainly we have all desired the development of the mines, but we have refused to make a title to the miners. I am not prepared to say that any plan of conferring title which has been proposed has been satisfactory to me. It is a very difficult question. The land that shall be given to any one man for purposes of mining ought to be very limited. How much will you give him, and upon what terms, and upon what payments? We are not prepared to decide this question; but the miner, under the policy of the United States, which allows him to go upon the public land, and has never treated him as a trespasser, adopts for himself the laws which the necessities of his condition require, and the State courts recognize them; and I understand the territorial courts have recognized them, and from that decision an appeal is now sought to the Supreme Court of the United States. What will be the decision of the Supreme Court? I apprehend there is no question about it; the Supreme Court will say that to maintain an action of ejectment a man must rely upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his opponent's. What will be the effect of that? The effect will be not to decide according to the usages of the miners, and give the right to a mine to the man who developed it, and who has been driven from it; but their decision will be that neither party has a title, that the United States own the land, that so far as the United States are concerned both parties are trespassers, and neither can maintain an action of ejectment. Ought we to say to these miners that they are trespassers? In view of the policy of the United States they are not trespassers. A man who goes on the agricultural lands of the United States is treated by the Government as a trespasser if he goes in any other character than as a preëmptor. If he goes upon the public lands of the United States to cut down the timber upon the pine lands, it is the policy of the Government to arrest him and to punish him for the offense; but it is not the policy of the Government to punish as a trespasser a man who goes upon the mineral lands with a view to their development. We encourage it, we say he is not a trespasser by the policy we have adopted; and although I am very reluctant to vote against the proposition of the committee, I think there are such high considerations of policy touching the development of the mines as will justify me in voting not to give an appeal. The law left them there. The parties in right may not demand an appeal. Whether a man may take a case from one court to another depends entirely upon the law; there is no natural right about it. We do not allow an appeal to the Supreme Court in all cases; it depends upon the amount in controversy in many instances; so that it is not a matter of right that a man shall go to the Supreme Court. It is a matter merely of law. He has not the right, then, under the law; and as a question of policy, ought we to give an appeal to the Supreme Court when that will break up a system that the miners found it necessary to adopt under the policy of the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not know in what way my friend from Indiana has found out that these cases in the Supreme Court affect mining privileges and should be decided alone by the usages of mining. For all that I know these cases involve the title to lands, and if so it is but just and right that there should be an appeal. But I rose principally for the purpose of saying that these cases, as I understand it, that are pending in the Supreme Court, are now before that court upon a motion to dismiss them merely, on the ground that the Territory has been made a State since the appeals were taken. If that motion be rejected the cases will not come up for hearing until the latter part of the next term. They are beyond No. 300, and the court is now at No. 125, so that it is impossible that they can be heard until Congress shall have been in session at least two or three months of the next term.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator will allow me to say that there is but one mining case in the list.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not know there was any.

Mr. CONNESS. One is sufficient, because the rule of decision adopted in one will apply to all.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unless we legislate.

Mr. FOSTER. I referred to it only to show that none of the cases would be reached for more than a year.

Mr. STEWART. I will correct the gentleman. The amendment of the committee also provides for bringing up all the cases disposed of in the last five years.

Mr. FOSTER. But they cannot be reached for three years to come. I mention it to show that there will be ample time for legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I meant to say was that if it be advisable to legislate upon the subject of mining titles, and I think it is, we shall have ample time to do it. There is no necessity, therefore, now to do injustice in all the cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, for I understand there is now but one that involves a mining title. The cases entered in that court are numbered 300, 325 and 327, and, as I said just now, they cannot be argued before March of next year, and in the mean time we can devise a system which will protect the mining titles, and place them upon the footing on which, as I think, they ought to stand.

Mr. CONNESS. The suggestion of the Senator from Maryland in this case I think is not a wise one, if he will permit me to say so. He says that because the cases now in court will not be reached, and consequently will not be determined for a long time, it is unnecessary now to legislate upon the subject, for the reason that in the interim we may adopt and may be compelled to adopt some wise law, the wisest we can devise, which shall regulate the possession and ownership of the mines. This is his suggestion as I understand it. Now, let me call the attention of the honorable Senator and of the Senate to this point. Suppose that at the next session of Congress, which will be a long one, we begin to devise a system according to which citizens of the United States may obtain title to mining lands of the United States, I apprehend that any system we shall devise must necessarily transfer the title in fee from the Government to the citizen. It is true we may adopt a system of leasehold, but I hardly think we shall enter upon that. Then suppose we shall devise a wise law by which citizens of the United States may go upon the mining lands and enter them in small quantities, say amounts of one acre each, the system or plan will provide that the United States shall transfer its title with or without a consideration to the citizen. How shall it be with regard to the particular mine involved in the appeal that is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States? Who shall buy the land upon which that mine is located? Will you provide that the plaintiff or defendant in that case shall buy that particular mine? They cannot both buy it, for they cannot agree as to their ownership. It would be unjust to allow either of them to buy it while a question is pending and unsettled in regard to it.

Let me say to the Senate now that when they shall adopt a system for the disposition of the mines, it must necessarily involve in it a concession to the present possessors of the mines, and the United States must recognize existing possession, and title by possession, by granting the mines possessed free to the parties who possess them, or by exacting from the possessors a consideration of value for them. You can never adopt a system by which you shall take away from our citizens what they have possessed for fifteen years last past, and you have allowed them to enter upon and to invest their capital in, and transfer it to others. You must determine upon what terms they may buy from you or may legally possess from you. Any system that may be adopted must contain such provisions. Now, I ask again, what will you do in regard to the cases pending?

Mr. President, you cannot legislate in regard to cases pending. Whatever plan you adopt must contain a provision that shall say that the right of possession, according to the rules of priority of possession, shall give the party in possession a right to buy from the United States, or the right to possess legally, and in cases of contest, where the right of possession is yet open and not determined, those cases shall be allowed to be considered by the courts until one party or the other is determined to be the party having the best right to possession, and he shall be allowed then to obtain the title of the United States.

If you do not adopt, in connection with this bill, in continuing this jurisdiction from the courts of the Territory to the United States Supreme Court, a provision which shall give the jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of the United States notwithstanding the title in fee simple is in either party, plaintiff or defendant, you expose us on the one hand to be driven out of court, and you expose the entire mining stocks held all over your country to the dreadful consequences of such a decision, which I apprehend is something that we are not justified in doing. Why not adopt a provision in this act, when you continue this jurisdiction, which shall not only continue the jurisdiction, but shall require the recognition of the only title, so well described by the honorable Senator from Indiana, the title in the citizen by his right of possession under the United States, his prior right of possession. We say the Government of the United States own all these lands. We go out and enter upon them. I take, in accordance with the rules of local recognition, a certain possession. You recognize it, every man in the community recognizes it; but finally a disorderly man comes along and says, "Sir, you have got too much there," or "You have got what you do not own," and he undertakes to eject me by force; or when I am absent from the possession—as has absolutely occurred to me personally, for I have labored in the mines—before I rise in the morning, before the break of day, a party comes and violently seizes that which was mine by quiet, peaceable possession. If I do not see fit to exercise force in ejecting him, what is my remedy? I bring an action in one of the local courts. How is the case determined? Witnesses are summoned, called in, and sworn; the testimony goes to the first possession. The case is decided according to the testimony, and according to the priority of possession. The party who loses feels aggrieved and he appeals. The record is sent up, and the case is still maintained in the upper court upon the rule of priority of possession and the equity of it; and it is, as I said before, upon this equity and upon this rule that all our rights of property in the mine now rest. Will you disturb them? Will you not adopt a provision, when you are continuing this jurisdiction, to prevent the causes from being sent out of court for want of jurisdiction, because the property is in another, namely, the United States, and not in either party, plaintiff or defendant? I am sure there can be no objection to that.

The gentlemen who ask for the passage of this act, as I understand the honorable Senator from Maryland does, desire the Supreme Court to pass upon it. Am I not right in that? The honorable Senator from Maryland responds that I am. Then let us guard ourselves against being rejected from that court, and above all against the terrible consequences to all mining property of such a rejection. I ask Senators to pause, and I ask Senators who have charge of this bill and who have reported it here, to pay attention to the great interests that are involved in the decision they are about to make. I agree with Senators who have spoken, and especially with the honorable Senator from Indiana, that at an early day it is our duty to enter upon the question of the disposition of these lands.

It is almost a crime, Mr. President, in the United States Government to permit communities to grow up, Territories to be organized, States to come into being, now three mining States in this Union, within the next quarter of a century to be perhaps twenty States, built upon what? Upon the basis of the right of possession to their property. To my mind the picture of twenty States in this Republic, whose people shall not be bound to the Government by the ownership of the soil they live upon, is perfectly frightful. It is a premium upon vagabondage; it is a reward to itineracy; it is against all social, moral, and political advancement.

I admit, sir, that in the remarks I have made I have gone away from the exact point before the Senate, but I have been tempted to do it that I might call the attention of Senators seriously to all that is involved in this question of the disposition of the mineral lands, to the question of where the title shall remain. I hope again, in closing, that no Senator will object to continuing specifically the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, since we are about to adopt a bill to that end, so as to make it certain that in the court of last resort we shall not be ejected because there is title in neither party to the suit.

Mr. JOHNSON. At the proper time, or now, if it is in order, I will propose an amendment as an additional section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POWELL in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from Nevada is now pending, and an amendment to that amendment is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the amendment by substituting for it the following:

And be it further enacted, That no possessory action in any of the courts of the United States for the recovery of any mining title, or for damages to any such title, shall be affected by the fact that the paramount title to the land in which such mines are in the United States.

Mr. STEWART. The more I think of this question, the more thoroughly satisfied I am that we have not met it fully by that amendment, and the more thoroughly satisfied I am that when we are legislating upon a question which must bring up and produce important results upon the mining titles, we should meet the whole question in some form so that those titles may be protected. I think that if the bill be laid over we can agree upon something that will protect the parties. On examination it will be seen that this section not only provides for cases that are now pending in the Supreme Court on appeal, but it provides for bringing up all the litigation from Nevada Territory from its first organization until now, and I assure the Senate that all the important claims in Nevada have been through the courts; and to bring them up here without some legislation as to the mode of procedure when they get here, some recognition of our local customs, would be destructive to our rights, and would certainly injure us a great deal during the coming year. I renew the motion—I regret to do it—that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until some amendments may be perfected to it. I presume we can soon agree to the amendments if we have time to perfect them.

Mr. SUMNER. I will make a motion which will be a substitute for the motion of the Senator, that the Senate now proceed with the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the freedmen's bill. ["Oh, no."]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This whole debate has gone on by the courtesy of the Committee on Indian Affairs. A bill of that committee is pending before the Senate, and I have been waiting, expecting that the Nevada bill would come to a vote, for about two hours. The bill of the Indian Committee to which I refer was discussed yesterday and was regularly in order before the Senate at one o'clock to-day, and I wish to have it disposed of before we take a recess at half past four o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish also that the report of the committee of conference be acted on. That ought to take precedence.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is out of order, because the other is in order. I suggest to my friend from Connecticut as there are several amendments to his bill, one by the Senator from Maryland and one by the Senator from Nevada, that he let it now go over and be the regular order of business for tomorrow in the morning hour, so that I may call up the Indian bill to which I have referred and have it disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON. I offer the amendment which I have read, as I understand I can do, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada. I say to that Senator and to the Senate that in my opinion it will cover the case for which he desires to provide. I understand that his difficulty is that the possession in mining privileges is not protected by suit because the courts here hold that the paramount title is in the United States, and no title except a title acquired under the United States by patent can be protected. This amendment says that in no such case shall the fact that the paramount title to the land in which the mines are in the United States have any influence.

Mr. FOSTER. To the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada I have no objection. I am not authorized to speak for the committee, because it has not been before them, but I doubt if the committee would object to it. It seems to me that it will protect the claim of the Senator from Nevada as fully as his own amendment; and if it be adopted and the bill be passed with that amendment, we may get rid of what appears to me is likely to be a very protracted discussion. The Senator from Massachusetts wants to get up another bill; the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to proceed with his bill; and there are various other bills that are equally pressing. If we drop this bill now, it is dropped until it will be too late to act upon it. There is not another bill before the Senate which if passed at any time before the session closes will not have all the effect that it will have if passed to-day; but unless this bill is passed and passed through both Houses before the 27th, this being the 21st of the month, it might as well not be passed. I may suggest, therefore, to Senators that it seems to me they are attacking a bill which is certainly of great importance and which is more pressing in its necessities than any bill before the Senate. I hope there will be no disposition to put it off, and that Senators will not be disposed to discuss it more than is necessary; I by no means suggest that they do, but I trust our words may not only be chosen but few.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the reading of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland again. The Secretary read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no possessory action in any of the courts of the United States for the recovery of any mining title, or for damages to any such title, shall be affected by the fact that the paramount title to the land on which such mines are in the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. I think that will meet the case.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that. The amendment to the amendment was adopted, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I am not fully satisfied that the provision covers the case. If under it the principle of prior possession would be recognized without any controversy by the courts, if it would prevent the pleading of outstanding title in the United States—

Mr. JOHNSON. It does that.

Mr. STEWART. But I do not think it quite meets the case of allowing prior possession to be set up.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly it does. It meets that very case.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that he add these words, or something equivalent to them, "but each case shall be adjudged upon the law of possession."

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to that. I understand that to be the effect now.

Mr. STEWART. With the words proposed to be added by the Senator from Kentucky, I have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let those words be added.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That modification will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the Vice President was authorized to appoint a member upon the Committee on Enrolled Bills, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Hicks, and Mr. NYE was appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. SUMNER. If I may be permitted, I move now that the Senate take a recess at half past four o'clock until seven o'clock, for the purpose of considering public business.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope not. I shall have to ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to proceed with the consideration of the committee of conference on the Freedmen's Bureau bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POWELL.) The regular order of business is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) relative to a certain payment to the Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan; but before putting any question the Chair will ask the indulgence of the Senate to present some bills on the table.

The bill (H. R. No. 771) for the relief of the personal representatives of Jonas A. Hughston, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill (H. R. No. 763) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to say to the Senate that the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad is familiar with the bill, and he has suggested that it is useless to refer it to the committee. It relates merely to the companies organized in California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

The amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 389) relating to clerkships in the Post Office Department, and to the bill (S. No. 390) in relation to the postal laws, were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

RECESS.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess from half past four to seven o'clock this evening.

The question being taken, there were, on a division—yeas 17, nays 8; no quorum voting.

Mr. FOOT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Hale, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Powell, and Ten Eyck—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Collamer, Harding, Henderson, Howe, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Sautsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wright—16.

So the motion was agreed to.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up Senate bill No. 414, relating to a railroad in my State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate as the order of the day, being House joint resolution No. 38.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to postpone all other business for the purpose of taking up that bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I cannot consent to that. I have refused to consent to a similar request of my honorable friend from Massachusetts. My good nature in consenting to allow the Nevada bill to occupy almost the whole of the day, when the Indian bill was really the order of the day, was rather severely taxed. I do not object now, because the thing is disposed of, but I think I must not allow myself to be carried away by these appeals any further.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My poor Indians have occupied very little of the attention of the Senate at this session.

Mr. HOWARD. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not going to press my motion now against my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who has in charge a bill which is already under consideration and the Senate is midway in its discussion; but it is my duty to remind the Senate that there is another measure which is likewise under discussion, in which the Senate is already midway, and on which, indeed, the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] is in the very middle of a speech; and that is the report of the conference committee on the Freedmen's Bureau bill. I must insist that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of that measure as soon as they have finished the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin. Sir, the measure is one that ought to be acted upon—

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I want to say to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that I desire him not to call up his bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I was going to say that I had telegraphic dispatches from different parts of the country relating to the report of the conference committee, one, for instance, from an eminent citizen of Chicago, who says to me, "Entreat the Senate to pass the Freedmen's Bureau bill." Now, sir, if I had any power of entreaty, I would use it on this occasion with my honorable friend from Wisconsin and with every Senator present. I do think that the Senate ought to proceed with its consideration. It is my duty to urge it upon the Senate. Let the Senate vote upon it, and so far as I am concerned my duty will then be done.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say a single word in reply, with reference to the personal allusion which the honorable Senator has made to me in connection with this matter. The session of Congress is drawing rapidly to a close; there are but few days of the session remaining, and there is a great deal of important business, some of indispensable importance, to be transacted. The Senator reminds us that on his favorite bill I am in the midst of a speech. Well, sir, the Senate ought to act upon this motion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, with a full understanding that the subject of that speech is inexhaustible, and that whenever it comes up again before the Senate I shall be entitled to the floor; and if these considerations are not sufficient to induce the Senate not to take up that bill at all, I am altogether incapable of comprehending the case. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. Therefore, Mr. President, I think the Senate should take up that bill this afternoon, and give the Senator the whole evening in which to make his protracted speech. Let him speak till midnight, till the cock crows, if he will, but then let us vote.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the best disposition to make of the case would be to postpone indefinitely the Senator's bill, and all the speeches that the Senator may make on that or any other bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, being the joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians, residing in Michigan, the sum of $192,850.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Upon that subject the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] was upon the floor.

Mr. HARLAN. I had said about all I wanted to say when I gave way yesterday. If anything was not then said, I have forgotten entirely what it was, [laughter,] and so I shall forego the privilege of addressing the Senate now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from Iowa and myself are associated upon the Committee on Indian Affairs; we generally agree in our views; and whenever there is any disagreement of opinion between him and myself, I confess that it tends somewhat to destroy my confidence in my own opinion; but in this instance I think the honorable Senator's proposition does not meet the case as properly and as justly as that which is proposed by the majority of the committee; and now, if I can have the attention of the Senate for about five minutes, I think I can state to them all that I desire to say in answer to the views expressed by him yesterday.

He suggests as one reason why he looks upon this appropriation with distrust, that there have been agents employed in the prosecution of the claim, and that if this amount of $50,000 is paid over, a considerable portion of it will go to those agents. The Senate, if they will look into the joint resolution, will find that by its provisions the money is to be paid over by the agent of the United States for the Indians in Michigan, who is Hon. Mr. Leach, with whom most of the Senators are acquainted personally, and it is to be paid over by him to the Indians themselves personally in Michigan. These Indians, or most of them, are said to be farmers in Michigan of considerable intelligence and advancement in civilization, many of them very good farmers. Under these circumstances, I think that there is no danger that this appropriation will not reach the Indians for whose benefit it is designed.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that I have been informed from a source that I think reliable, that very soon after the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate in favor of paying $50,000 to these Indians, one of the agents here in Washington telegraphed to a friend in Michigan residing in the neighborhood of these Indians, and that he went to work immediately and bought them out before they had any knowledge of what the Senate committee had done, for a very trivial consideration, that he now holds those contracts, and if the money shall be paid under this proposition of the committee, it will probably go to those agents, or the most of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This is a rumor of which I have never heard anything, and, of course, have no knowledge.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to know who that person was. I never heard of such a fact before.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There has been another rumor whispered about in relation to the claim in regard to the Pottawatomies that reside in Kansas. After the joint resolution was passed by the House of Representatives proposing to allow $192,000 to the Michigan Indians it has been rumored that certain agents who opposed that claim agreed that they should be entitled to one half of all the reduction from $192,000 which shall be made on the final passage of the resolution; but as to all these rumors I know nothing, and will not undertake to vouch for the truth of any of them. In the discussion of the question, and in the examination of the claim, my purpose has been simply, so far as we can arrive at it, to do justice between these two sections of the same Indian tribe. It is not a matter which concerns the Treasury of the United States. What we pay to these Michigan Indians we pay out of annuities which go to the Indians in Kansas.

Mr. President, I come now to the discussion of what I regard the material point in the case, whether there is anything due to these Indians under the treaties. It is alleged on the one hand that nothing is due to them because they did not remove from the reservations in Michigan and go to the northern part of the peninsula of Michigan—that is the language of the treaty—to l'Arbre Croche. I admit that the Indians did not go there to reside. They went there, but for some reason they returned. Upon that subject there is some evidence as to what the reason was why the Indians did not remain. The superintendent of Indian affairs, in his letter of March 25, 1843, to the Department, says:

"A delegation of the Pottawatomies, who resided on the reservation in Michigan prior to the treaty held at Chicago in 1833, and who have always refused to emigrate, called upon me a few weeks since to represent their grievances also. They stated that the chief, Pokagon, (father of one of them,) as also several of his band, were Catholics at the time of signing the treaty, and refused to emigrate west, as it would cause them to recede again into barbarism; that permission was granted them by said treaty to settle in northern Michigan, where they would enjoy the instruction of priests, and receive their proportion of the annuities; that they in due time applied to the Ottawa of l'Arbre Croche, near Mackinac, for permission to amalgamate with them, which, owing to the interference of some evil-disposed whites, was refused; that they then purchased lands of the United States, which a portion of them still occupy, (except forty acres appropriated to their mission.)"

Now, Mr. President and Senators, as between the two branches of the Indian tribe it is of no earthly consequence to the Indians of Kansas whether the Michigan Indians were permitted to live at l'Arbre Croche or at Lake Pokagon. What difference did it make to the Indians in Kansas? The question whether they lived at Lake Pokagon or at l'Arbre Croche, or lived in Michigan at all, was a question as between the Michigan Indians and the United States. We have waived our rights, if we had any, to compel them to live at l'Arbre Croche, and it does not affect the equities between the Indians of Michigan and the Indians of Kansas whether the Michigan Indians went up to the northern part of the peninsula of Michigan or removed to some other point in the State of Michigan. We by allowing them to remain there, we by conferring a title upon them to land and allowing them to settle upon it in Michigan, have waived any technical right we had to insist that they should go and live with the Ottawas at l'Arbre Croche; and therefore I think that the equities of this case as between the two branches of the Indian tribe do not require us to say that these Indians by remaining in Michigan have forfeited their rights. That is the view which pressed upon my mind, and I think it is just. Although you may say technically they did not live at l'Arbre Croche as the treaty required, there was yet an excuse for it, and we at all events have waived that condition and allowed them to remain in Michigan. My friend from Minnesota in speaking on this subject said there were some Pottawatomies now wandering in Wisconsin.

Mr. RAMSEY. Winnebagoes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And there are some Pottawatomies also in Wisconsin as well as some Winnebagoes that have never removed west; but there was no provision in the treaty for the benefit of those residing in Wisconsin, while there was an express clause in the treaty in relation to the Catholic band of Indians in Michigan, and the purpose of this appropriation is to carry into effect the clause of that treaty.

The Senate understand, as I stated the other day, that the House of Representatives proposed to take $192,000 for this purpose and give to these Indians in Michigan; not only their right to a share of the money annuities, the $50,000 which we propose to give, but also to give them a right to a share of the lands which have been sold west of the Mississippi river, and a right to their portion of the school fund which was to establish schools in their new homes, and the mill fund which was to establish mills there also. The committee of the Senate rejected these propositions and reduced the amount to $50,000, and, as I have said, we propose to divide it into five equal annual instalments; and lest there should be any danger of the money getting into the hands of agents here in Washington or anywhere else, we require the money to be paid over into the hands of the Indians in Michigan by the Government agent there, who is Hon. Mr. Leach, with whom most of us are personally acquainted.

Mr. HOWARD. I will endeavor to state as briefly and clearly as I am able the ground of this claim. The bands of Indians called in this joint resolution and these documents the Michigan Indians constituted a part of what is known as the United nation of Pottawatomies, Chippewas, and Ottawas. At the date of the treaty of Chicago of September 27, 1833, these Michigan Indians owned and possessed within the limits of Michigan, then a Territory, one hundred and sixty-four sections of land. On the 26th of September, 1833, the United nation made a treaty with the United States by which they ceded to the United States about five million acres of land lying within the limits of the State of Illinois. The Michigan Indians did not intend, it seems, to remove west of the Mississippi river in pursuance of the policy of the Government which then existed—it was under General Jackson's administration—and in order to quiet them there was formed on the 27th of September, the day after the main treaty of Chicago was formed, a supplemental treaty, and in the supplemental treaty the contracting parties agreed as follows:

"And as since the signing of the treaty?"

That is, the treaty of September 26—

"And as since the signing of the treaty a part of the band residing on the reservations in the Territory of Michigan have requested, on account of their religious creed, permission to remove to the northern part of the peninsula of Michigan, it is agreed that, in case of such removal, the just proportion of all annuities payable to them under former treaties, and that arising from the sale of the reservation on which they now reside, shall be paid them at l'Arbre Croche."

What was their share in the annuities existing under prior treaties? Nothing but their proportional share as members of the United nation. What was their interest in the reservations in Michigan? They were the possessors and occupants of one hundred and sixty-four sections of land lying in Michigan which had been reserved to them under prior treaties. By this supplemental treaty they sold their one hundred and sixty-four sections of land to the United States for the sum of $100,000, $60,000 of which were paid down to them in cash and in goods, and there remained to be paid to them the sum of $40,000, which was stipulated by the treaty to be paid in annuities of $2,000 a year.

Now, sir, it is perfectly easy to see, is it not, that this $40,000 was part of the purchase price of the reservations which they sold by the supplemental treaty of the 27th of September. That sum has never been paid to these Indians, nor have they been paid any sum whatever as their proportional share of the purchase price of the lands belonging to the United nation and which were sold to the United States by the treaty of the 26th of September. That balance due to the Michigan Indians remains still to be paid, and this is the basis to their claim. They stand, and stand solely, upon this stipulation in the supplemental treaty of the 27th of September, permitting them, if they saw fit, to remove to the little settlement called l'Arbre Croche, in the northern part of the lower peninsula of Michigan.

I am not able to agree with what seems to be the opinion of my friend from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, when he intimates, or seems to intimate, that it was a requirement of the supplemental treaty that these Indians should go to l'Arbre Croche. I do not so read the treaty. It certainly is not so expressed in the terms of it; the terms of the treaty being that "in case of such removal they shall receive the just proportion of all annuities payable to them under former treaties and that arising from the sale of the reservation on which they now reside," at that place. Is it not as plain as the sun at noonday that this clause was incorporated in the supplemental treaty merely for the benefit and advantage of these Michigan Indians, and for no other purpose? Certainly it is to my mind a very strained, unnatural, and absurd construction to say that in case they refused to go to and remain at l'Arbre Croche they forfeited all their right and title to the purchase-money which belonged to them upon the cession of their lands to the United States. Without intending any disrespect to the gentlemen opposing this claim, I must say that it is certainly a very ingenious mode of cheating the Indians by a mere interpretation of a treaty written in a language foreign to them and which most of them were totally ignorant of. In a dispute between two white men, the one having sold his land to the other, and agreed, if you please, to take payment at a particular place, what would be said if a defense to such a claim as that were that because payment was not demanded at the place where it was due, it was therefore absolutely and totally forfeited? Such a defense would not be listened to a moment in a court of justice. I dislike to occupy the time of the Senate on a point which is to my mind so perfectly obvious, so incapable of argument.

I remarked yesterday that I supposed the resolution from the House of Representatives, appropriating $192,000 to the Michigan Indians, was founded upon a report of the committee of the House of Representatives and upon an estimate which had been furnished from the Indian Bureau. I was contradicted in a very grave manner—certainly in a very sincere and courteous manner—by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. LANE,] who informed the Senate that I was "very largely in error" in that statement, and that the resolution really was founded upon no such report. I beg to refer the Senate to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives, dated February 19, 1864, in which the committee use the following language on this subject, and it contains a brief statement of the whole case. Speaking of the Michigan Indians, they say:

"They continued their efforts and carried the matter to Congress, and on the 2d day of March, 1861, a law was passed ordering an examination, and report to Congress, which was completed and made by the Secretary of the Interior on the 19th day of December, 1862. The records of the Committee on Indian Affairs show that the claimants were not then ready for action, and the matter has laid over to the present time."

And again:

"Six hundred and forty-three thousand dollars of this money is now in the hands of the Government at five per cent. The report of the Secretary of the Interior shows the amount due the claimants to be $192,845, which sum has been paid to the main nation erroneously, and should be reclaimed and paid to the claimants."

I hope the Senator from Kansas, before he contradicts me again in a statement of fact will condescend at least to examine the documents connected with the case.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HOWARD. In a moment I shall be through. This document is not only a report of a committee of the House of Representatives, but it embodies in itself the result of an investigation and a report made in the Indian Office and furnished to Congress, so that in both respects my statement was accurate and true and was not "largely in error," as the Senator imputes. This report shows that these Indians in Michigan are entitled in justice and equity not only to the sum of $50,000, which is the amount of the present amendment, but to $192,000 as the just amount of indebtedness to them on the part of the Government of the United States.

I hope, sir, that the joint resolution will pass, and that partial justice at least will be done to these Christian Indians who have waited so long and so patiently for that which is honestly and legally due to them, but which has been withheld from them for some reason or other. I am asked whether the Indians have made claim before. On that point let me read from the very report which I hold in my hand:

"The whole was properly ratified by all parties. The removal of the main nation west did not commence until three years after, namely, 1836. The records of the Department show that up to this period Pokagon and his band shared equally in all of the annuities mentioned heretofore. From that date the whole of the moneys were paid out to the main nation west until 1843. In that year Robert Stuart, then superintendent at Detroit, Michigan, addressed a letter to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, stating that sons of Pokagon and some of his people had applied to him for their annuities guaranteed to them under the treaty of 1833; that they had been to the northern part of Michigan; that Pokagon was dead; that they had received no moneys, and that they numbered about two hundred and fifty persons. A portion of the $16,000 perpetual annuity under the treaty of July 29, 1829, was then allowed them, amounting to $1,387 50, and has been paid to them annually ever since. Thus the matter rested until somewhere about 1856, when these Indians, being satisfied that they were not having their just rights, again importuned the Department for action in the matter, which was denied, except to admit there was something due them from 1836 to 1843."

And from that time, 1843, up to the present time, these Indians, poor, ignorant, dependent wards of the Government as they are, have by their agents, at their own expense, and at a very heavy expense, been prosecuting themselves their just claim against the Government of the United States. I remarked yesterday that the character of the agents in this case has nothing whatever to do with the merits of the claim. I presume it is, like hundreds of other claims, in the hands of agents appointed by the claimants. I have a knowledge of some of the agents who are connected with the prosecution of this claim, and, so far as I know, and so far as I believe, they are gentlemen of honor and of veracity and of integrity. One of them, who has been residing here during the whole session, is a member of the Indian band itself, himself an educated Indian, as honest a man and as sincere a man as lives. It is very likely that a portion of this money that may be recovered will be given over to attorneys and to agents who have assisted the Indians in the recovery of it. It is not to be withheld on that account. If the Indians have employed agents and attorneys, they expect, like honest men, to pay them, and they are waiting for this appropriation to enable them to do so.

I can say no more, Mr. President, in behalf of this claim. I believe it to be a just and a righteous claim, one which long ago ought to have been paid; and I now appeal to the justice of the Senate in behalf of the dependent Indians whose land we have taken and used and sold, the proceeds of which we have put into our Treasury, to do at least partial justice to the poor and needy, even at this late period.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, this appeal would be very well if it were made in favor of the poor, uneducated Indians against cultivated people; but it is an appeal made by the cultivated, educated Indians of Michigan against the wild Indians of Kansas. The Indians in Kansas have never been heard. This proposition is to put your hands into their money bags and take out money due to them, under the uniform decision of this Government for nearly thirty years, and pay it over to highly educated Indians, as the Senator says, now residing in Michigan, and to take it from the Kansas Indians without a hearing. The Michigan Indians have been heard by their attorneys here, able men. And I have nothing to say against their reputation as men. I suppose they are lawyers of ability and integrity, and deem that they have a right to claim and collect all the fees they can get under fair contracts. But these Kansas Indians have not been heard. It is said that a gentleman, representing himself as their agent, has been here, and has printed a pamphlet and laid it on the desks of Senators; and this same gentleman did appear before the Indian Committee. He came without any authority whatever, as far as I know, and, it is said, had previously been employed by the Michigan Indians in the same case. Be this as it may, it will be observed that, in the conclusion of his printed argument, he urges that the Government should pay something to the Michigan Indians; and I have no doubt he is in complicity with the agents who are prosecuting this claim for the Michigan Indians, and will share in whatever amount they recover.

Another of the remonstrators against this Michigan claim, who made an appeal to me personally in favor of the Kansas Indians, originally, a month or two since, came to me quite recently and urged me to go for the claim. I have no doubt that he, too, will share in the bounty if it shall be secured. Now, what assurance have we that the Indians in Kansas will acquiesce in this arrangement? Congress is asked to pass a law taking from the Kansas Indians $50,000, and paying it over to Indians in Michigan who have been adjudged solemnly by this Government not to be entitled to it. The Senator from Michigan says that it sounds to him very much like quibbling to say that these Indians in Michigan never complied with their contract under the treaty, and seems to impute to the members of the Indian Committee, who take the view of the subject which I do, that we are not entitled to much respect for coming to the conclusion at which we have arrived, and for saying that these Indians were not entitled to money because they had not complied with their contract to remove. This is a reflection on the Government more than on those members of the committee who oppose the claim. They have not been paid this money by the Government from 1836 to the present hour, because, in the opinion of the Government, they had not complied with their contract under the treaty. I might, I think, in the face of these facts, appeal to the Senator from Michigan to say whether he himself is not the quibbler, if such a term is appropriate in this presence.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator will allow me to say that I believe I have not used any such term as that. I am not conscious of it, if I have.

Mr. HARLAN. I so understood the Senator, but I cheerfully accept his correction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It being now half past four o'clock, the Senate will take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate resumed its session at seven o'clock p. m.

W. H. AND C. S. DUNCAN.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of W. H. &

C. S. Duncan. It was taken up yesterday and half finished. I want it disposed of. It is merely to pay $200 for supplies furnished to Kansas militia in 1856.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POWELL.) The Chair can only entertain such a motion by unanimous consent, the business pending at the time the recess was taken being the business regularly before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of W. H. & C. S. Duncan was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL L. GEROULD.

Mr. CLARK. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 450) for the relief of Samuel L. Gerould.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Samuel L. Gerould, late sergeant company G, fourteenth New Hampshire volunteers, the sum of $179 20, for his services as clerk to a general court-martial from September 21, 1863, to December 24, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM PIERCE.

Mr. CLARK. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 442) for the relief of William Pierce.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, execute, and deliver to William Pierce, duplicates of the following-described bonds of the United States of America, Treasury Department, for the Oregon war debt, issued by the United States under an act of Congress approved March 2, 1861, payable at any time after the 1st of July, 1881, at the Treasury of the United States, with interest at the rate of six percent. per annum, namely, No. 679, No. 682, No. 681, and No. 270, with coupons attached; the first three bonds being for the sum of one hundred dollars each, and the last named being for fifty dollars, each bond being signed L. E. Chittenden, Register of the Treasury, and each of the coupons attached being signed G. Luff; but before the issue of the new duplicate bonds, Pierce is to execute, or cause to be executed and deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to the full acceptance and satisfaction of the Treasurer, such bond of indemnity as is usually required by the regulations of the Treasury Department for the issue of duplicate certificates of inscribed stock.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

DEPARTMENTAL COUNSEL FEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Some time since a resolution was adopted by the Senate, at my instance, calling on the heads of the several Departments of the Government to inform the Senate how much money had been paid for counsel fees by their respective Departments. The resolution has been responded to by all those officers except the Attorney General; he has not answered the resolution. I move that all the replies which have been received be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now I move that the Attorney General be again directed to respond to the resolution of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE J. STUBBLEFIELD.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 109) authorizing the adjustment of the claim of George J. Stubblefield for chewing tobacco furnished to the United States, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Commissary General of Subsistence to adjust the claim of George J. Stubblefield for chewing tobacco furnished to the Army of the United States under Major General W. T. Sherman, at Atlanta, Georgia, upon the same principle and evidence as govern the adjustment of claims for authorized supplies received by the subsistence department of the United States under the act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States, approved July 4, 1864; and the sum ascertained to be due, not exceeding $14,746 50, is to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THANKS TO GENERAL THOMAS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the resolution of thanks to General Thomas.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 139) of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas and the army under his command was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BROWN. I move to amend the resolution by inserting as additional sections:

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the thanks of Congress are also hereby tendered to Captain S. Phillips Lee, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for the skill, gallantry, and good conduct exhibited by them in cooperation with the land forces under command of Major General Thomas in the late great and decisive victories in Tennessee.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That the President be requested to communicate these resolutions to the officers named, and through them to those serving under them, embraced in the foregoing vote of thanks.

I move this amendment in justice to those connected with the Navy in cooperating in the movements in Tennessee; and in doing so I think it will be only necessary to read from a dispatch of Major General Thomas, addressed to Acting Rear Admiral Lee, the following sentences:

"Your efficient cooperation on the Tennessee has contributed largely to the demoralization of Hood's army. Major General A. J. Smith, commanding a detachment of the army of the Tennessee, will probably reach Clifton by Sunday next, January 1, 1865, where transports are expected to meet him to take his command to Eastport. Please afford him every assistance in your power in effecting a secure lodgment at Eastport, and as I consider the Cumberland now entirely safe I will be obliged to you if you will have a strong force kept in the Tennessee to keep open navigation on that river.

"In concluding this telegram, it gives me great pleasure to tender to you, your officers and men, my hearty thanks for your cordial cooperation during operations of the past thirty days.

GEORGE H. THOMAS,

Major General.

"To Acting Rear Admiral S. P. LEE, Commanding Mississippi Squadron, Flag-ship Fairy, Chickasaw, Alabama."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed, and the joint resolution read a third time. The resolution was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read: A resolution of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas and the army under his command, and to Captain S. Phillips Lee and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to call up the unfinished business and press it to a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POWELL.) The unfinished business is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians residing in Michigan, the sum of $192,850, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, on which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARLAN. I have said about all I wish to say. I am willing to take the vote now on the amendment that I proposed.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I want to settle a question of veracity between myself and the Senator from Michigan. I tried to have an opportunity when the Senator was indulging in denunciation, but with his native courtesy he refused me the opportunity.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I am not aware that I ever denied any request of the Senator from Kansas to say anything he chose to say on this question; and I am at a loss to understand this singular language.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I rose to my feet and asked the Senator from Michigan to allow me to explain, which he refused to do. It was on a question of veracity.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no recollection of ever hearing the Senator make such a request. As to the question of veracity, I am ready to hear him on that subject. If he desires to make any explanation, that is his privilege, as a matter of course.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In the first speech made by the Senator from Michigan on this subject he stated that the House committee had reported in favor of $168,000 for the Michigan Indians, to be taken from the funds of the Kansas Indians, and that that amount was predicated upon an estimate—

Mr. HOWARD rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to assure the Senator and the Senate that I made no such statement as that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Well, Mr. President, all I can say is that I looked for the printed report of the speech to-day, and it is not yet in the Globe. I state now how I understood his remark, and the remark which I corrected.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It was that the House committee had reported the sum of $168,000 in favor of the Michigan Indians to be taken from the Kansas Indians.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. One hundred and ninety-two thousand dollars.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should have said $192,000. The statement of the Senator from Michigan was that the House committee had reported that sum to be due, which was predicated on an estimate of the Indian Bureau. After the Senator made that statement, I rose to my feet and said that in that statement he was largely in error; that the Indian Bureau had estimated a much smaller sum; I said I thought about ninety thousand dollars. The Senator to-day, as I understood him, reiterated the statement he made yesterday, and took me to task for having corrected him incorrectly. I have the estimate of the Indian Bureau before me, and I propose to read it to him and to the Senate. This is signed by Mr. Dole, and dated November 15, 1862:

"But wishing to present all the evidence at my command that will aid you to make up your decision, I have prepared a statement for your consideration which, if in your opinion is a more just and equitable distribution of the annuities than the former, you can adopt it."

That estimate is $73,112 50, being $17,000 less even than the amount stated in my correction of the Senator. I desire to say to him now that when I correct a Senator in a statement of fact, I do it in kindness and courteously, and I hope that I may be treated kindly and courteously in response to it.

Mr. HOWARD. What I said yesterday, in the opening speech to which the Senator from Kansas alluded, was that the joint resolution now under consideration, which came from the House of Representatives, was founded upon a report of a committee of that House, in which it was stated that the amount of $192,350 was estimated to be due to the Michigan Indians, and that report of the committee of the House of Representatives was derived from a report or from information furnished by the Indian Bureau. That is what I stated. It had been some time since I had actually seen the report to which I had reference, and I had it not by me at the moment, and could not therefore read from the page itself. After I had made this statement, the Senator from Kansas, I thought with an air of assurance, at least of great confidence, remarked to the Senate, by way of interrupting me, that I was "largely in error." Sir, I was taught, when I was young, when making a statement of fact to do so with accuracy, so far as I could, not to overstate and not to understate; and I confess that the charge of being "largely in error" on such a statement of fact was not very agreeable to me. Hence when I produced the document here this afternoon and read from it, showing that my statement was substantially accurate in both particulars, I did refer to the remark made by the Senator from Kansas in such terms as to call his particular attention to the mistake which he had made in charging me with inaccuracy. I did not intend of course any disrespect to the Senator from Kansas. If this be the question of veracity which he seeks to settle between himself and me, I have no more to say about it; I leave it to the Senate and the country.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Do I understand the Senator from Michigan to say that the amount of $192,850, as found by the House committee, was predicated upon an estimate of the Indian Bureau?

Mr. HOWARD. I did not use the word "estimate." I know not whether it was an estimate or something else; it was a report made from the Indian Bureau, as the very report of the committee of the House of Representatives says.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. But I have just read from the report of the Indian Bureau making an estimate of $73,000, instead of $192,000.

Mr. HOWARD. I know not what document the Senator from Kansas has before him; but I know what I have before me quite well. In the document which I have before me, and which is the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, the following language is used, in speaking of the report from the proper Department:

"The report of the Secretary of the Interior shows the amount due the claimants to be $192,845, which sum has been paid to the main nation erroneously, and should be reclaimed and paid to the claimants."

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have shown the report of the Indian Bureau. The present Secretary of the Interior has reported to the Committee on Indian Affairs that there is nothing due from the Kansas Indians to the Michigan Indians.

Mr. HOWARD. The committee of the House of Representatives in their report, speaking of the claimants, say:

"They continued their efforts and carried the matter to Congress, and on the 24 day of March, 1831, a law was passed ordering an examination, and report to Congress, which was completed and made by the Secretary of the Interior on the 19th day of December, 1832. The records of the Committee on Indian Affairs show that the claimants were not then ready for action, and the matter was laid over to the present time."

Afterward it says "the report of the Secretary of the Interior shows the amount due the claimants to be $192,845."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If my honorable friend from Michigan and my honorable friend from Kansas will allow me a moment, I can explain how this discrepancy arises, and how in fact both Senators are right in one view of the case, and both are wrong in another.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like the honorable Senator from Wisconsin to show in what respect I am wrong in this matter.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to this claim there were two statements by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, two calculations based upon two distinct sets of principles. In the one calculation he found that there was $73,112 50 due to the Michigan Indians; but if he made his calculation upon the other basis he found that $192,845 was due, and in the latter basis he includes a share of the lands west which have been sold, for which the tribe have a principal sum of $643,000 drawing interest, and he includes also interest upon the money which had not been paid to them. Including their share of the $643,000 which was realized from the sales of lands west of the Mississippi, which alone amounted to $71,000, and the interest upon the payments which ought to have been made, amounting to $33,000, he made up the whole sum of $192,845. Now, the committee of the Senate reject the principle that the Michigan Indians shall have any share in the lands west or shall have any interest upon their claim or any share in the school fund or the agricultural fund which belongs to the establishment west of the Mississippi, but confine the Indians in Michigan to their share of the money annuities which, as we reckon them, amount to $50,000. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his computation making out $73,000, allows the Indians of Michigan the whole of the $2,000 annuity which is provided in the supplementary treaty, and does not divide that annuity with the tribe west of the Mississippi, but keeps it all for the Indians in Michigan. In that way he makes the difference more than is made by the committee of the Senate in their estimate.

This is really a difference in the basis of computation. It is true, as the Senator from Kansas says, that the present Secretary of the Interior, on looking at this case in the first instance, did write a letter in which he stated that he did not think anything was due to the Indians in Michigan, putting his opinion upon the very same ground on which my friend from Iowa has placed his opinion, and that was that they did not comply with the treaty in removing to the north part of Michigan. Mr. Caleb B. Smith, however, the former Secretary of the Interior, recommended the payment of the sum of $73,000.

These are the facts, in short, which show the discrepancy. The House committee, as stated by my friend from Michigan, recommended the payment of $192,000.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly; and that was all I stated, that the House committee recommended the payment of that amount of money; that that was reported as being due to the claimants in their report, and that that report was founded upon a report from the Secretary of the Interior. Certainly my honorable friend from Wisconsin will not pretend that in all this I am in the wrong at all. I simply recite the contents of the documents which are before me. The documents may be wrong or may be right; I am not responsible for them. Although I may not be able to satisfy the honorable Senator from Kansas that my "native courtesy" is at all comparable with his own, still I trust that he will be satisfied with this explanation. Certainly I am.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And now, if the Senate is prepared, I should like to take the vote on this question and dispose of the case.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am perfectly willing that the Senate shall act on this joint resolution when I have made a statement to them of two points, which will take about two minutes. The Pottawatomie Indians, from whom it is proposed to filch this money, are our western tribe, lying contiguous to the warlike Indians. It is proposed without their consent, and without their being represented, to take one fourth of their annuities from them, upon which they depend for food and clothing, without our having heard from them, without their having been before the committee or having had notice that there was any such thing likely to take place; and I submit and give notice to the Senate that there is danger of creating such a feeling in that tribe as to have the scenes of Minnesota repeated upon the people of Kansas. About one half of this tribe are what are called Prairie Blanket Indians. They are uneasy now, and have been since this war commenced, and the taking from them of this money, upon which they depend for food and raiment, I am satisfied will create a hostile feeling among them.

Again, I submit to the Senate this question: we treat these Indian tribes as independent nations; we have been paying to this tribe or independent nation of Pottawatomies for thirty years this money; now it is proposed, without consulting them, to take it from them and pay it to a colony, as if you were to take money due to the Government of Great Britain and pay it to Canada, her colony, without consulting the British Government. I have believed, and I again state to the Senate that the true policy is to recommit this subject to the committee; let the Pottawatomie Indians have notice of the purpose to take from them their national money, let them send their agent here, be heard before that committee, and then, if you conclude to force the money from them, they will not have as much reason to complain as they have now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to the statement of the Senator from Kansas that the Pottawatomies have not had notice and have not had an agent here, I wish to state the facts as I understand them. The joint resolution was passed by the House of Representatives in March last year. Mr. Brackenridge, claiming to be their agent, and who has filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs a power of attorney showing that he is their agent, has, in writing, in print, and in person appeared before the Indian Committee on two or three occasions to oppose this claim, and his printed statement has been before the committee, and I believe is with the papers.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Now, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Does not the agent of the Michigan Indians in his argument make the point upon Mr. Brackenridge that he is not the agent of the Pottawatomie Indians?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Brackenridge, however, has filed his power of attorney with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. But has not been recognized.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. He has been heard, and his written statement has been filed; and this case has been fully heard, I think, by the committee on both sides. As to my friend's apprehension of an Indian war in Kansas, to grow out of the fact that we take from Indians who have been overpaid this money, without charging any interest, and pay it over to those rightfully entitled to it in five annual payments, are altogether unfounded. We simply say that the Indians in Kansas shall refund to the Michigan Indians what belongs to them. Those apprehensions, it seems to me, must be without any foundation.

Mr. HARLAN. I will state to my friend from Wisconsin that their being over paid is the very question in issue.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Of course, as between my friend and myself that is a question. He claims that nothing is due to them.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, is nothing in this Government ever to be settled? Are we not to accredit the official acts of our public functionaries? They have decided and executed the treaties, and paid the money due under the treaties for thirty years past, and they have done it in this case in pursuance of the principle and policy that has been maintained in relation to every other Indian tribe since the foundation of the Government. Now, with what propriety can a Senator come here and say that this money has been wrongfully paid to the main body of these Indians? It has been paid in strict pursuance of treaty stipulations and in strict pursuance of the policy of the Government in relation to this particular tribe and in relation to every other Indian tribe with which we are now in treaty relations from the beginning; and the passage of this bill is to overturn the policy of the Government, is to set up a new policy at war with the principles that have heretofore controlled the executive branch of the Government. Under this view of the case I think it may well be suggested by the Senator from Kansas that the Indians themselves will not be satisfied with this, they not having been consulted. You make a treaty with them, and agree to pay them certain sums of money from year to year. This money has been paid annually for thirty years last past; and now, without consulting them, without entering into any treaty regulations or bargain with them by which you obtain consent to this diversion of one fifth of their funds, you propose to pay it over to other people that they say are not entitled to it, and which you yourselves, through the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for thirty years last past, say they are not entitled to.

The interpretation that I place on this treaty is in accordance with the ruling of the Government. This question has been decided over and over again every year from the ratification of this treaty down to the present moment, and this bill proposes now to unsettle this policy, to overturn these decisions, to go back thirty years and take money from these Indians, or stop future payments in the Commissioner's hands for the purpose of paying it over to parties that are not entitled to it according to your own ruling, according to the uniform action and policy of your own Government and your own executive officers. I cannot see where this will end if we are to unsettle the policy of this Government in this way. You have the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior from year to year now paying out millions of money to the Indians. If that is to settle nothing, if it is all subject to be overturned by a committee of the House of Representatives, or of the Senate, on the suggestion of some claim agent, when are these questions to be ended, when are they to be terminated? Among civilized communities an honest debt is supposed to be barred in the course of six or eight or ten years. Ought not such a principle to operate in favor of savages with whom we are in treaty relations?

It seems to me this question is too plain for an argument, and I hope that the motion of the Senator from Kansas may prevail. If anything is to be done I prefer that the amendment I proposed should be adopted. I think this is the nearest fair of anything that has been suggested, but I shall not be tenacious on this point.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa speaks of this bill as being a departure from the policy of the Government; he has not shown in what respect it is a departure from that policy, and I must still presume that what he says on this subject is assumption without proof, for certainly I have seen no direct proof of it.

Mr. HARLAN. I have referred to the provisions of the treaties themselves, and I have listened just now to the reading of the report of the Secretary of the Interior, as recited by the chairman of the committee. The present Secretary of the Interior says that these Indians are not entitled to anything under the treaties; and there can be no question on that point in the minds of those who are familiar with the provisions of the Indian treaties. I know a technical argument may be set up, such as we have listened to to-day and yesterday from the Senator from Michigan, as to the literal or technical meaning of certain phrases in a treaty; but then no one will call in question that these treaties have been executed as they were originally intended to be executed, in accordance with their spirit and meaning, as understood at the time and understood ever since for a period of thirty years by the Government itself.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the policy of the Government, if there be any such thing worthy of the name, is to do justice and to keep the contracts which the Government has made not only with the Indian tribes but with foreign nations. That is the true policy of the Government. Now, sir, I know of no policy of the Government of the United States which can set aside the plain, imperative language of a treaty into which the Government has entered. In the present case the Government has entered into a treaty which in direct and positive terms engages to pay to these Michigan Indians their just proportion of the purchase price of the lands sold by the United Nations in Illinois, and the price of the reservations lying in Michigan. That clause declares:

"It is agreed"—

Agreed not only by the Indians, but by the United States—

"that in case of such removal"—

That is, the removal of the Indians to l'Arbre Croche—

"the just proportion of all annuities payable to them under former treaties, and that arising from the sale of the reservations on which they now reside, shall be paid them at l'Arbre Croche."

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Will the Senator permit me to inquire the date of that treaty?

Mr. HOWARD. The date of that treaty is September 27, 1833, entered into at Chicago. Now, sir, I stand, not on the policy or practice of the Government merely; I stand not on the construction which an officer of the Government may have seen fit to give to this treaty—

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the Senator—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly, with my "native courtesy." [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. For which, with native courtesy, I thank the Senator. [Laughter.]

The Senator has read from the treaty of 1833. I read from the communication of the Department of the Interior, office of Indian Affairs, November 15, 1862—

Mr. HOWARD. I supposed the Senator's object was to put an inquiry; I certainly did not intend to yield the floor for him to read long documents.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire merely to read a few lines to show that that treaty has been settled.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I read:

"The attention of this office was called to this case while Mr. Greenwood was Commissioner, and he reported"—

Mr. HOWARD. What does the Senator read from?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated "Department of the Interior, Office of Indian Affairs, November 15, 1862," and signed "William P. Dole, Commissioner," in which he says:

"The attention of this office was called to this case while Mr. Greenwood was Commissioner, and he reported to Secretary Thompson, January 8, 1861, and decided that they were entitled to a proportion of the annuities under the treaties of July, 1829, a supplementary to that of September, 1833, amounting to $18,000, and per annum of $1,587 50, which sum was duly remitted and paid to them for 1843, being the first payment made to them thereunder since the year 1836, and from which period they have since been regularly paid from year to year."

Mr. HOWARD. That document emanates from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and is dated in November, 1862, if I heard correctly. The Secretary of the Interior, the chief of that Commissioner, on the 19th of December, 1862, certifies in a report made by him that there is due these claimants the sum of $192,845, and the report is dated one month subsequently to the document from which the Senator from Kansas read.

Mr. HARLAN. I think I ought to state in relation to the Windom report, as it is called, to which the Senator from Michigan refers, that Mr. Windom told me in person that he did not draft the report; he never wrote it; his name was attached to the report as a mere matter of form, and he requested me to ask our committee to look into the subject more narrowly on that account.

Mr. HOWARD. I rely upon the official documents which are laid before the two Houses of Congress relating to this claim. If there be any error in that report of Mr. Windom, especially if there be one so glaring as is now intimated by the honorable Senator from Iowa, I beg to know why he has not searched out the original materials for the purpose of showing and making apparent this error. It certainly was worthy of his utmost industry and labor, and still he rises in his place in the Senate and assumes to contradict a solemn official report, and to discredit it utterly upon his own assertion that hearsay evidence has been brought to his ears contradicting it. I cannot accept any such evidence as that to set aside a solemn report made to one of the Houses of Congress.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator does me injustice in intimating that I have not examined this subject. I have certainly examined it from the top to the bottom with what little capacity I possess, and the conclusion that I come to is that nothing is due to these Indians.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no doubt about that. The Senator need not have repeated that assertion. That was entirely obvious at the commencement of the discussion on this subject.

Mr. SUMNER. I appeal to my learned friend from Michigan now to allow a vote to be taken and let us proceed to something else.

Mr. HOWARD. One word more only, in conclusion. Mr. President, standing on the solemn stipulations of the treaty made between the United States and these claimants, by which the United States agreed to pay them so much money at such and such times, an act which the United States have not performed, it is in vain to tell me and to tell the Senate of the United States that the solemn stipulations of a treaty are to be set aside and annulled by the mere practice of the Government in refusing payment, or by any other means except an act as solemn as the treaty itself which shall annul it. Sir, these claimants have been knocking at the doors of Congress for more than twenty years; since 1843 they have made this claim and kept it alive before Congress and done all that was in their power to do to obtain justice at the hands of the nation that ought to be their protectors and friends instead of their enemies. It comes, it seems to me, with a very ill grace from members of Congress or from those who affect to represent the Government here to set up a sort of statute of limitations against these Indians who have been kept out of their honest dues, not by any laches or neglect of their own, but by the omnipotent power of Congress, which has refused to do them justice. Sir, go into a court of equity and try this question, and it would not be long before you would get an answer directing the payment of this money to be made to the Indians. I have no doubt about the justice of the case.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire for one moment to call attention to the language of the treaty. My friend from Iowa insists that nothing is due to these Indians by virtue of this stipulation, that they are not entitled to anything. We have paid them all the while their share of two annuities, of the annuity under the treaty of 1829 and of the annuity under the supplementary article of the treaty of 1833. By the treaty of 1829 we were to pay to this tribe $16,000 annually forever, and by the supplementary article of the treaty of 1833 we were to pay them their proportion of all annuities.

Mr. HARLAN. I will inform the Senator of the distinction. The annuity due under the treaty of 1829 was payable to these Indians whether they removed from Michigan or not. It was no part of the treaty of 1829 that they should remove either to l'Arbre Croche or west of the Mississippi river, and hence Commissioner Greenwood, in adjudicating the case, decided that they were entitled to the annuities that were previously due under treaties the provisions of which did not require them to remove, but it was the supplement to the treaty of 1833 which required them to go to the one place or the other.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But why was not that included in the payment? So there was a treaty of 1809 for the payment of $5,000 annually. There was no provision about removal in that; that was not included. So there was a treaty of 1818, by which we agreed to pay $2,500 annually forever to this tribe of Indians. That was not included. So also there was the treaty of 1823, by which we agreed to pay them $2,000 annually, and that was not included. The truth is that Commissioner Crawford, when he admitted the right of these Indians to their share of the annuities, by mistake did not look into the treaties to see how many treaties there were under which they had a right to receive annuities; he just took one and omitted all the rest. That has caused the whole difficulty.

Mr. HARLAN. That is an assumption against the Government that is not justifiable. The Indian department now withholds moneys from Indians for any misdeeds on their part, for any violations of the peace of the neighborhood in which they live, for any robberies that they commit, and how now can a Senator stand up here, after a lapse of more than fifty years, and say that these annuities were not withheld on that account? It is a presumption against the fairness of the Government that is not justifiable on the part of any Senator here. The presumption is that the Government did deal with them fairly and in accordance with the treaties and the usages of the Government as established in their intercourse with these Indians. Why, sir, to maintain that the Government has not the right to withhold the payment of annuities to an Indian tribe when they are at war, or when they are engaged in robberies and thefts, is to unsettle the relations of the Government with the Indians and render it impossible for the Government to maintain the peace of the borders. I suppose there is no man now living who can tell why these annuities may have been withheld unless it may be General Cass, who was familiar with the relations of the Government with these tribes for half a century past; but for an individual whose connection with the Government does not reach back to exceed from four to ten years to assume here that the Government has not dealt fairly with those Indians, because he is not able to know the reason that controlled the action of the Government, is, as it seems to me, unjustifiable.

I have but one other word to suggest in relation to this matter. When our political friends were in power, and claims such as these, as they appeared to me, unjust and dirty claims, were raked up and paid, we denounced the Administration for its sanction of any of them. I cannot do now, when my own political friends are in power, that which I should denounce if done by my political opponents. These claims have all been rejected by our political opponents when they were in power as unjustifiable under the treaties then existing, and the policy of the Government as it had been maintained with these Indian tribes. Shall we now, the moment our opponents whom we have denounced for their corruption go out of power and our own friends come in, do that which was too rotten for them to sanction? Others will do as they choose; I shall not sanction it with my voice or vote.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to recommit this joint resolution to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to say that I make this motion for the purpose of giving the Kansas Indians an opportunity to be heard before the committee.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wiley, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Doolittle, Farwell, Howard, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Stewart, and Wade—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Santisbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wright—20.

So the motion to recommit was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on this bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is simply on concurrence with the committee. I have nothing to say. I believe every Senator has made up his mind. All I ask is for a vote.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I did not intend to discuss for a moment the merits or demerits of this bill—I think they are quite well understood by the Senate—except to call attention to the fact, first, that one of the sections of this bill proposes to do what the President of the United States in a very carefully prepared document two or three years ago declared to be unconstitutional, and to be so clearly so as that he could not approve a bill containing the proposition. I do not suppose, inasmuch as the Constitution has not yet been changed in that respect, that the President can approve a bill which he has said is unconstitutional.

But, sir, I wish to call attention to the mode of legislation that is now proposed. As I understand the facts to be, at the last session the House passed a bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs. It came to this body. The chairman of the committee of this body having it in charge reported a substitute. That substitute was adopted. It went to the House. The House did not agree to the substitute. Then the whole matter was referred to a committee of conference; and that committee bring in neither bill, but, as I understand, a new bill. The committee of conference bring a new bill before this body, which cannot be amended, which must be adopted or rejected in whole, and ask a vote upon it. Sir, I think that is a mode of legislation that this body ought not now to indorse. It may suit the pleasure of some Senators to adopt it in this instance.

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt the Senator there? I know the Senator's desire, of course, is to state the case precisely as it is. I do not know that what I am about to state, with his permission, would alter the case in his opinion; but still, in my own opinion, the Senator has not stated the case precisely. The substitute brought in by the committee is, in point of form, to a certain extent, new, but it is not in substance. The bill reported by the committee, in substance, is the identical bill on which the Senate has already voted, with one exception: that instead of placing the bureau in the Treasury Department, as the Senate did in their original bill, or in the War Department, as the House did in their original bill, it is placed in a bureau or Department by itself. That is the single difference of substance between the bill originally passed by the Senate and the bill now reported by the conference committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think that the statement of the Senator shows my understanding of the facts to be incorrect. I did not state, nor was it possible for me to suppose, that the bill reported by the committee of conference is in every respect a new bill, in the sense that it is different in every respect from either the bill of the House or of the Senate; but, sir, it is not the bill of either House. It is the bill of the committee of conference. And now the Senator calls attention to a very material point in which the committee of conference has not represented either the House or the Senate. The bill as it came from the House placed this proposed bureau under the charge of one Department of the Government. The bill as adopted by the Senate placed it under the charge of another Department. The committee makes it a bureau of no Department, but a Department of itself.

Now, I ask the Senate if it is to be allowed that a committee of conference can assume to make a new bill, not representing either body, not a compromise between the bodies, and force us to a vote for or against that amendment. I should desire to propose as an amendment that this bureau, if it must be created, shall be placed under the charge of the Interior Department, a Department to which it seems to me to properly belong, having reference to lands and to persons. If we take charge of the colored people who become free during the prosecution of the war, then it should be placed under the charge of the Interior Department, as the Indians are under the charge of that Department. If we take charge of the lands that become the property of the United States during the prosecution of the war, then the lands ought to be under the charge of the Interior Department, the domestic Department of the Government, as the public lands are under the charge of that Department. I should like to propose an amendment of that sort; but under this system of legislation, that I think for the first time is now to be adopted, I am denied and every Senator is denied the possibility of proposing an amendment. My purpose was to call the attention of Senators to this important feature of this proceeding, and that it should not become a precedent without a protest.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, as I shall feel constrained to vote against a concurrence in the report of the committee of conference, I desire to state why I shall sever from many friends with whom I usually act on this occasion. Let me say in the outset that I do not think any person here entertains any more sympathy with the colored refugees or with the white refugees than I do, and I think no one is more anxious than I am to make all adequate provision for their protection and support; but I confess that I am afraid of this bill should it be enacted into a law.

The first objection that I have to it is that it creates an independent Department, which was not contemplated by either branch of Congress that passed the original bills that were sent to the committee of conference from whom this report comes. My conviction is that it is necessary, in order that these people should be properly protected and cared for, that they should have military protection. I entertain to day the same opinion that I entertained last year when this subject was under consideration, that these persons should be, temporarily, under the charge of military officers; and it seems to me that the committee of conference entertained that opinion in a measure, for they have provided in the tenth section of the bill that they have reported:

That the President of the United States is charged with furnishing the military and other support needful to carry this act into effect, and any military officer may be appointed under this act without increase of salary.

Now, why not put it at once under the Secretary of War? If we are to have this bureau, why not allow it to be connected with the War Department and make the officers immediately responsible to the military authorities? In what an anomalous position will these officers be whom it is authorized to select from the Army who are to be commissioners and supervising agents under this bill. Are they to be civil officers from the time they are thus appointed, or are they to be military? Is there any greater degree of responsibility that is to attach to them than would attach if they were selected from civil life?

Another objection that I have to this bill is that it only applies to the rebel States. Is it not known that there are at least twelve thousand colored refugees in this city at this moment who are in the utmost distress? Is it not just as desirable that this Government should take care of and protect those refugees as it is of those that are within the rebel lines, or in the States in hostility to us? I want the Secretary of War authorized to do by some act what I know he is doing at this moment, furnishing the proper provisions and clothing and fuel for the protection of these people; and I want them to be placed upon the same footing as they would be if they were across the river in the State of Virginia.

The fifth section of this bill gives to the commissioners who are to be appointed under the act the right to bestow all the lands within the rebel States upon these colored refugees or freedmen. Now, I suppose it is known to all the members of this body that we have in some of those southern States, as Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas, immense tracts of public land. Under the provisions of this fifth section all of these public lands will fall to the colored men, and there is no provision for that very destitute class of Union white men of whom we have heard so much, and of whom I am happy to believe there are many in each of those southern States, who are left, by this war, in just as unfortunate and helpless a condition as that in which the colored men are left. I am not prepared to say by the passage of this bill that all the lands and all the abandoned plantations in that country are to be given, under an act of Congress, simply to the colored people, and that the white refugees and the white Union people residing there, who are in exactly as destitute a condition as these colored men, shall not have any advantages.

But, Mr. President, the principal objection I have to this bill is embraced in the ninth section, which provides—

That whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen who may come under his care, he shall, as far as practicable, make provision for them with humane and suitable persons at a just compensation for their services.

When the amendment out of which this section has sprung was before the Senate, which was proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY,] I voted for it. It then provided that these commissioners might provide homes for these freedmen, and authorized the commissioners to open negotiations or correspondence with the Governors and municipal authorities of the other States in order to accomplish that purpose; but that last clause which authorized them to open correspondence with other States has been stricken out; the word "homes" has been stricken out, and the word "provision" has been inserted. What is meant by the word "provision?" The Commissioner is to make provision for these colored persons, as far as practicable, "with humane and suitable persons." Who are to determine whether these men are humane and suitable persons? The Commissioner, nobody else. There is no appeal from the Commissioner. He shall make provision, for what? Evidently, for the labor of these freedmen; because the next clause says, "at a just compensation for their services." Now, I should like to know what there is to prevent one of these commissioners making provision for one of these freedmen by hiring him out for one year. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts, who has charge of this bill, would admit he could hire him out for one year. If he could hire him out for one year—

Mr. SUMNER. With the consent of the party, just as the Senator himself might be hired out for one year with his consent.

Mr. GRIMES. There is no such provision in the section, unfortunately, for that would remove many of the objections to it.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. If the Senator will allow me I will read the provision:

And every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a free man, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law.

Mr. GRIMES. That is a very excellent clause, and a very noble and grand stump speech which the Senator has injected into one of the sections of this bill; but it is not in this section, and is not in the section that relates to the hiring out of these men.

Mr. SUMNER. It is in the law.

Mr. GRIMES. It is in the law, but relating to another subject entirely. It is not in this section, and has no connection with the hiring out of these men. I will ask the Senator what section that clause is in.

Mr. SUMNER. The fourth section, which lays down the general principles that govern the whole subject and the treatment of the freedmen.

Every section of the bill is to be interpreted with reference to that. That is the pole star of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. The section from which the Senator has extracted that sentence reads as follows:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall have the general superintendence of all freedmen throughout the several districts, and he shall watch over the execution of all laws, proclamations, and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen; and he shall establish regulations from time to time, and cause the same to be enforced, for their needful and judicious treatment, protecting them in the enjoyment of their rights, promoting their welfare, and securing to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty. And every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a free man, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him, except in conformity with law.

"Except in conformity with law;" and now the Senator in the ninth section provides a law which authorizes the Commissioner to hire out these men, and puts no limit upon the time for which they shall be hired, puts no limit as to the character of labor they shall perform, does not say that they shall be attached to the soil, and thereby become serfs or not. I say, Mr. President, that the argument of the Senator wholly fails him. The section provides that the freedman shall be treated exactly "as a free man, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law;" and yet the law provides that the Commissioner may hire him out. It fixes no limit to the period for which he may be hired out. It fixes no limit as to the amount of compensation that he shall receive. It does not define the character of labor that he shall perform.

Now, I admit very frankly that if this law was to be executed by the Senator from Massachusetts it would be humanely executed; I have no doubt that if it was to be executed by the men into whose hands it will at this moment fall, it may be humanely executed; but how do I know who is going to execute this law in the future? As a friend of the emancipated slave, I am unwilling by my vote to place such unlimited power over him in the hands of anybody.

Mr. President, as I said before, that section is the principal objection that I have to the bill. There are other and minor objections. I do not for my own part see how the twelfth section is going to be enforced, which provides:

That all assistant quartermasters, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as supervising special agents, shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by court-martial or military commissions, to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department within which they act as such assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, or supervising special agents.

I do not see myself how a commanding officer in the department of Tennessee can with any judgment, or propriety, or discretion, order a court-martial upon one of the officers created by this bureau, a civil officer entirely. There may be some connection between them, in the apprehension of the Senator from Massachusetts, which I do not comprehend; but I confess that it seems to me it would be extremely anomalous to authorize General Thomas, or General Washburne, or General Hurlbut, or any man who may happen to be in command of a department or a district to direct a court-martial or a military commission upon a man who is not responsible to him at all, over whom he has no control whatever, who is not required to report to him, of whose transactions he does not necessarily, nor by law, know anything whatever.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to remind him here that the clause that he now criticises was introduced on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] and had nearly the unanimous vote of the Senate? There were but a very few dissenting votes. I do not remember whether the Senator from Iowa was present on the occasion, but that is the way it comes into the bill; and the conference committee having the subject in charge did not feel themselves at liberty to drop a section which had been thus authoritatively introduced into the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems somewhat remarkable that the conference committee should have been unwilling to drop so awkward and anomalous a section as that, and yet were willing to assume the responsibility of creating an entirely independent Department that was not provided for or contemplated by either of the two Houses of Congress that appointed the committee. If it was drawn by the Senator from Wisconsin I can only say, if he will permit me to say it, that he drew a very awkward section, and such as cannot by any possibility, as I understand the military organization, be carried out.

Now, Mr. President, I find lying upon my table here a very short bill, which purports to have been introduced into the House of Representatives by the distinguished gentleman, who is the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of that House, that very nearly carries out my views as to what is necessary to be done, and which I trust will be adopted by both Houses of Congress this winter. I believe it will accomplish precisely what we ought to accomplish. It will provide not only for these freedmen within the rebel jurisdiction, but it provides for the twelve thousand men who are starving here right under our eyes. I will read it:

An Act to establish, in the War Department, a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a bureau be established in the War Department, to continue during the present rebellion, to which shall be committed the supervision, management, and control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel States—

This includes the white as well as the black—or from any district of country within the territory embraced in the operations of the Army, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the head of the Department and approved by the President. The said bureau shall have one chief, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose compensation shall be $3,000 per annum, and such number of clerks as may be deemed necessary by the chief of the bureau, and approved by the Secretary of War, not exceeding two of the fourth class, two of the third class, three of the second class, and five of the first class.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President may assign to such bureau, for the benefit of said refugees and freedmen, the temporary use of such abandoned lands and tenements in insurrectionary States, not belonging to loyal owners, as may be necessary, and may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen and their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws conflicting herewith are hereby repealed.

Now, sir, if it were possible, I would move that bill which I find upon my table as a substitute for the report of the committee of conference. We know what this means. The language that is used in this bill has received legal construction. We know at its passage precisely what it will do. We know exactly what the expense of it will be. Has the Senator from Massachusetts ever calculated what will be the expense of the Freedmen's Bureau, and the officers that will be created under it by this bill of the committee of conference? I have not any time to do it, and I do not know that I am capable of doing it, but I imagine it will be enormous. The bill which I have just read is one that we can all understand. It is one that will accomplish what I desire to accomplish in connection with freedmen and refugees.

But, Mr. President, I only rose to state in a few words as I could why I cannot consent to concur with the committee, and with probably the majority of the Senate, in voting for this bill. I am content to-night to record my vote even against a bill in behalf of freedmen. I am unwilling to say that colored men who are emancipated under our laws, under our military control, and by the President's proclamation, shall be placed in such an attitude as I think they are capable of being placed in by the ninth section of this bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I propose to vote for this measure, although I confess there is something about it which is not exactly as I would have it; and I only desire to make this remark because the time may come in a year or two when I shall perhaps be glad to pursue the measure that I would pursue now if the bill was susceptible of an amendment. What I object to is that this measure has a look of permanency about it as if we were about to organize a Department of the Government to continue for all time to come. For twenty-five years I have maintained in this country everywhere that the negroes could take care of themselves. I have lived upon the border and seen them emancipated. I have seen thousands of colored and white refugees coming into my State, and I say here distinctly that the colored people are able to take care of themselves and find their places and adapt themselves to their new condition easier and quicker than the poor white refugees who are driven out of the border States. Any race of men that can adapt themselves to slavery can very soon adapt themselves to freedom. What I object to is that this bill looks as if we were to enter upon an established system of administration upon this question as a Department of the Government for all time to come. I want the men who take office under this bill, if it becomes a law, to understand that it is only a temporary measure. I do not propose to listen to their communications a year from now, in which they will undertake to convince the Senate and the country that everything depends on their continuing in office, and that these freedmen are never to be thrown upon their own resources, but are always to be held up and sustained by a Department of this Government. I am willing that this report shall be adopted; I am anxious indeed that it shall be adopted as a temporary measure, to take them by the hand for one year, perhaps, while they are marching out of their prison-house into the light of freedom. I am willing to sustain them by means of this character for six months or a year, temporarily. My objection, as I have said, is that this measure seems to look as if we were to enter upon a system by which we were to conduct this Department of the Government, as we have other Departments of the Government, for long years to come. I am looking for a speedy return of the colored population of this country to freedom and to taking care of themselves and adapting themselves to that condition; and all I think the exigencies of the case demand is some temporary expedient for a year or two.

Mr. SUMNER. I content myself with asking the vote.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I am opposed to this measure if I can procure for the colored man the elective franchise. When a man can vote, he needs no special legislation in his behalf. The Freedmen's Department, as proposed by the bill under discussion, uncoupled with the rights and privileges of free men for the colored men, in my opinion will illustrate history in the style that the Indian Bureau illustrates the beginning and end of the Indian. Sir, I am for perpetuating all races of men.

"What a piece of work is a man! How noble in reason! How infinite in faculties! In form, and moving, how express and admirable! In action how like an angel! In apprehension, how like a god!"

Sir, I am for all races of men. I do not believe that it is necessary to secure the prosperity of one race that another should be destroyed. I fear that the bill under discussion will destroy the negro race in this country. I know that its advocates have no such desire. Gentlemen desire to do the best that can be done for this unfortunate race. But, Mr. President, compromises of principle here, as everywhere, are dangerous. There is no necessity to compromise this question at this time. Those who advocate this bill upon humane principles should insist upon giving to this race the rights of freemen, and should never—no, never—accept anything less. Those who advocate the bill upon political theories should never consent that the only representatives of true loyalty in the South, the colored men, should be placed inside of a bureau to be cheated by the mercenary, or driven from the soil by their old masters, their most deadly enemies in all conditions except that of slavery.

If, sir, I cannot obtain for freedmen the privileges of such, I will give my vote for the proposition, but I must give it under protest. I give it, believing that the death I inflict is one that is prolonged instead of instantaneous—slow torture—by voting for the proposition, ending in death, instead of instantaneous death without this bill—results that will always occur by refusing to be just. I desire that those who advocate this bill will stop here and spend their time and talent in demanding for the negro race all the rights and privileges of freedom. Do this, and no Freedmen's Bureau is at all necessary.

To be technical, I object to the bill because it creates a Department. I desire that that feature shall be changed; and I hope that my suggestions will influence those who have charge of this bill. The Constitution of the United States permits the President of the United States to obtain, upon all questions that he may desire, opinions from the heads of Departments. You here constitute a Department of this Government, and make the head of that Department a Cabinet officer. You have one Department of Agriculture; and Senators have undoubtedly been impressed with the idea from the head of that Department of the importance of his becoming a part of the Government, of his becoming one of the Cabinet. It will not be long before the head of the Freedmen's Bureau will demand admittance under the Constitution as being one of the chief advisers of the President. I object, therefore, to the increase of Departments, upon the ground that we have Cabinet ministers sufficient to carry on the work and business of this Government.

Having made my point here in the beginning of this bill, I desire to go a step further than I am warranted. I desire to make two points: first, that the results of the present war, to be made valuable, require that those who have aided in our success should reap all the rewards of that success. No State must again be admitted into the Union that does not agree to protect those who have defended the flag and have been loyal to the Union; because, under the amnesty proclamation, as soon as peace is declared, the rebels will resume their original power, and crush out the Union loyal men, white and black, who have been opposed to them. The only safety to the Government is that all men who have been loyal shall have all the protection of the Union Government and all the rights of free men. The governments of the States in rebellion have been destroyed. There is only the record left—a record beginning in constitutional fealty and ending in treason to the Government and solemn obligations. The amnesty proclamation requires conditions for the individual to become a citizen. All I desire is that, in admitting these States into the Electoral College, conditions shall be required, and those conditions are that the State governments shall have existence only through the admitted right of the negro to a part in those governments, as being the most loyal element therein. The soldier must be protected, whether he be white or black; and because he is not able to protect himself, because all the money and privileges and influences of the world are against him, I desire his advancement and his protection.

I object to this bill because I feel that the interest both of the colored and white men will be prejudiced by its influence. Let us refuse admittance to every rebel State unless the privilege of the elective franchise is granted to the colored man. I believe the future permanency of this Government depends upon this, and I believe those who have fought this war have no safety and security without it. I am therefore opposed to this bill, because I fear the object desired by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts will not be obtained by the bill; and I hope it will be postponed.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have the question on the report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the report be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WILSON. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will make an inquiry of the Chair. If it were possible in any way to consider the bill in a legislative way, I would move to postpone it to a day certain during this session, but I believe it is beyond the control of the Senate to make any amendments to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POWELL in the chair.) In the opinion of the Chair, the report must be considered in its entirety, and no amendment can be made to it. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask if the report can be recommitted.

Mr. SUMNER. It cannot.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not see why. I ask the Chair. It is a report from a committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, we can reject it and then call for a new committee of conference. If we reject the report it comes to the same thing as recommending it, for then we could ask for another committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The only way to reach the object of the Senator from Indiana, in the opinion of the Chair, would be to disagree to the report and ask for another committee of conference. That can be done.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I move to reject the report, and withdraw the motion to postpone it indefinitely.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the original question, on concurrence with the report of the committee. If the Senate non-concurs with the report of the committee then the question will be open of communicating with the other House and asking for another committee of conference. I think, therefore, the question had better be taken, as is customary on the reports of committees of conference, will the Senate concur with the report of the committee? If the Senate do not concur, then the proposition of the Senator from Indiana can be made.

Mr. CONNESS. It must be apparent of course to the Senator from Indiana that if there is a clear majority of the Senate in favor of accepting the report, they will vote against the indefinite postponement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have withdrawn that motion.

Mr. CONNESS. Then let us come to a vote.

Mr. WILSON. On the question of concurrence I ask for the yeas and nays, and let us have a test question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senate is not full; this is an important measure; it is desirable to have a full Senate when the vote is taken; I suppose the discussion is ended; and as this will be the unfinished business for to-morrow, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. Oh, no; let us have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to adjourn, which is not debatable.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall not adjourn. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will withdraw the motion for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Iowa to submit another motion.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that this bill be postponed until to-morrow, until there is a full Senate. I do not recognize the propriety of this Senate being forced to take this particular measure in place of any other measure that may be proposed upon so important a question as this. I believe that when there is a full Senate here a vast majority of the body will indicate their opinion in favor of some provision for the government and protection of freedmen and refugees; but I believe that the sentiment of this body is against this measure as it stands. I want, therefore, a fair vote in a full Senate to-morrow on this subject, and let us have a new committee of conference if the sentiment of the Senate be as I think it is, and then we can have such a bill as will meet our approbation and meet the approbation of our constituents.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I see there is a determination not to come to a vote on this bill to-night, and there are several bills which have come from the Committee on the Judiciary that I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts will not object to; I therefore move to postpone the pending and all prior orders and take up House bill No. 692, in reference to prosecutions for libel in the District of Columbia.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, there were, on a division—yeas 11, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WILSON and Mr. CONNESS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dixon, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Ramsey, Sprague, and Trumbull—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Farwell, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wright—24.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. GRIMES. I renew my motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D Session.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1865.

NEW SERIES—No. 61.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was mistaken in considering the motion of the Senator from Illinois. The motion of the Senator from Iowa was first made.

Mr. GRIMES. I renew the motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. At what time?

Mr. GRIMES. I do not care what time so that there shall be a full Senate, and that we understand what we are about. My purpose is to get a Freedmen's Bureau bill that I can vote for. I think we can accomplish it to-morrow. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of this report until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope there will be no postponement. A motion to postpone at the present time is a motion to kill, and such is the unquestionable object of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES]. He is against this bill now just as he was at the beginning, and is acting according to his sense of duty when he tries in every way to defeat it. But are Senators who have thus far by their votes shown a determination to do something for the freedmen ready to follow his example?

The Senator says he wishes time. Perhaps. But he wishes something more. He wishes to arrest this legislation now at its latest stage. He says that he wishes an opportunity for debate. But, sir, has he not had this opportunity to excess and in largest measure? The Senate cannot forget how carefully and conscientiously this question has been considered—first, in a committee of this body, who gave their best attention to it for weeks during the last session of Congress; then for seven days in the Senate, during which the Senator signaled his opposition to the bill; and then again in a conference committee during the present session, where the whole subject was most thoroughly studied in every possible light; and then again in the debate, running over several days, which has already occupied the Senate since the report of that committee. Surely, if the Senator is not satisfied with the labors of the committees of this body, he cannot complain that opportunity of debate has been wanting. Sir, he has had the opportunity, and has exercised it.

I am pained by this opposition. It is out of season. I am pained by it especially from the Senator from Iowa. I do not judge him. But he will pardon me if I say that from the beginning he has shown a strange insensibility to this cause. He is for liberty, but he will not help us assure it to those who have for generations been despoiled of it. Sir, I am in earnest. Seriously, religiously, I accept emancipation as proclaimed by the President, and now, by the votes of both Houses of Congress, placed under the sanctions of constitutional law. But even emancipation is not enough. You must see to it that it is not evaded or nullified, and you must see to it especially that the new-made freedmen are protected in those rights which are now assured to them, and that they are saved from the prevailing caste, which menaces slavery under some new alias; and this is the object of the present measure.

Would you know the perils of freedmen ever since emancipation? Listen, then, to the words of that true patriot, General Wadsworth, who, after his visit to the valley of the Mississippi, and personal observation of the freedmen there, wrote thus:

"There is one thing that must be taken into account, and that is, that there will exist a very strong disposition among the masters to control these people and keep them as a subordinate and subjected class. Undoubtedly they intend to do that. I think the tendency to establish a system of serfdom is the great danger to be guarded against. I talked with a planter in the La Fourche district, near Tibadoville; he said he was not in favor of secession; he avowed his hope and expectation that slavery would be restored there in some form. I said, 'If we went away and left these people now do you suppose you could reduce them again to slavery?' He laughed to scorn the idea that they could not. 'What?' said I, 'these men who have had arms in their hands?' 'Yes,' he said; 'we should take the arms away from them, of course.'"

But this emphatic testimony is simply in harmony with accumulated testimony from other quarters. The freedmen, now rejoicing in recovered rights, must for awhile be saved from the traditional harshness and cruelty to which, for generations, they have been exposed. Call it protection; call it what you will. The power of the Government must be to them a shield. And yet you hesitate.

The Senator from Iowa renews now the objections which he made at an earlier stage of this legislation. It will not be forgotten that he most earnestly protested against the bill as giving to persons a control of the freedman. It was then shown, I think, to demonstration, that he was mistaken. But out of deference to his sensibilities, and that nothing might seem to be wanting to the protection of the freedman, other safeguards were introduced, as amendments on his motion, or in pursuance of his suggestions. But all this is not enough to secure his favor. He objects again.

Very well. So far as I understand his objection then and now, it is twofold: first, that the freedman is placed under constraint, and that he is not a freeman; and, secondly, that he is treated too much as an infant or a pupil. Now, I undertake to say that the objection in both these forms is absolutely inapplicable.

The freedman is treated in every respect as a freeman. Again and again in the bill his rights are secured to him. Thus, for instance, in the fourth section it is expressly provided that "every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a freeman, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law." Language cannot go further. In face of these positive words so completely in harmony with the whole bill, it is vain to say that the freedman is not a freeman. Sir, he is a freeman just as much as the Senator himself, with a title derived from the Almighty which no person can assail. When the Senator finds danger to the freedmen in this measure, he consults his imagination, inflamed by these hostile sentiments which he has allowed himself to nurse.

But the Senator complains that the freedman is treated too much as an infant or a pupil. How? Where? Let him point out the objectionable words. Analyze the bill. The freedmen, it is admitted, are under the general superintendence of the Commissioner. But are we not all under the general superintendence of the police, to which we may appeal for protection in case of need? And just such protection the freedmen may expect from the Commissioner, according to his power. The Senator himself is under the superintendence of the Presiding Officer of the Senate, whose duty it is to see that he is protected in his rights on this floor. But the Presiding Officer can do nothing except according to law, and the Commissioner is bound by the same inevitable limitations.

But there are regulations applicable to the contracts of the freedman. Very well. Why not? To protect him from the imposition and tyranny of the dominant race it is provided that "no freedman shall be employed on any estate above mentioned otherwise than according to voluntary contract, reduced to writing and certified by the assistant commissioner or local superintendent." Mark the language, "voluntary contract." What more can be desired? But this is to be reduced to writing. Certainly, as a safeguard to the freedman and for his benefit. Then, again, the commissioners are to act as "advising guardians," in which capacity they are to "aid the freedmen in their adjustment of their wages." But do not forget that the freedman is a freeman, and if he does not need such aid or advice he may reject it—just as much as the Senator himself. Look at other clauses, and they will all be found equally innocent.

But there is the section originally introduced on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY], providing that "whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any freedmen who may come under his care he shall, so far as practicable, make provision for them with humane and suitable persons at a just compensation for their service." Here again is tyranny and outrage carried to the highest point. But how? The Commissioner is to act as an intelligence office. That is all; and everything that he does is to be "in conformity with law." This clause, even if it were in any respect ambiguous, must be ruled by those earlier words which declare that "every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a freeman." What more can be desired? With this rule as a touchstone no freedman can suffer in his rights.

But the strange complaint is made that this measure is too favorable to the freedmen, and, indeed we have been told that something is needed for the whites. Very well; let it be done. I trust that an enlightened Government will not fail to recognize its duties to all alike. Meanwhile, it is proposed that abandoned lands shall be leased to freedmen, and if they are not able and disposed to take the lands for a twelvemonth, then they are to be leased to other persons. And why not? The freedmen for weary generations have fertilized these lands with their sweat. The time has come when they should enjoy the results of their labor at least for a few months. This war has grown out of injustice to them. Plainly to them we owe the first fruits of justice. Besides, this provision is essential as a safeguard against white speculators from a distance, who will seek to monopolize these lands, with little or no regard to the freedmen. Ay, sir, it is too evident that it is essential as a safeguard against grasping neighbors who still pant and throb with all the bad passions of slavery.

Mr. President, the objections to the measure are vain. It is not hurtful to the freedman. It is not hostile to liberty. Its declared object is the good of the freedman. Its inspiration is liberty. Look at it as a whole, or in detail, and you will find the same object and the same inspiration. It only remains that the Senate should adopt it, and give a new assurance of justice to an oppressed race. In the name of justice I ask your votes.

Mr. GRIMES. It was hardly necessary, I apprehend, for the Senator from Massachusetts, in order to round out his polished periods, to be inaccurate in his statements. He was hardly correct in saying that for seven days this bill received my opposition. If the Senator had refreshed his memory he would have discovered that I voted for the bill that was sent to the committee of conference, and supported it during the last days that it was under consideration in the Senate.

The Senator says, also, that this bill has substantially passed this body. I think the Senator is greatly mistaken. Did this Senate ever agree to create an independent Department of this Government to take charge of freedmen? Is not that a substantial change? Is this the same bill that was sent to that committee? Did not the bill provide in the ninth section, when it went to that committee, that these commissioners should provide, not for letting out these men, not for hiring them out for a compensation to be fixed by the commissioners, but should provide homes for them? And the amendment, when it was under consideration in the Senate, and when it was first adopted in the Senate, provided that they should open a correspondence with the Governors and municipal authorities of the northern States in order to find places and homes for them; but the Senator has changed that ninth section—

Mr. SUMNER. No, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. Sir, I have refreshed my memory on that subject. I have referred to the Congressional Globe. I have discovered that the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] declared that these commissioners might provide homes for the freedmen, and then there was an addition to it which directed that they might open correspondence with the Governors of States. That last part of it, in another stage in the Senate, was stricken off; but the bill as it went from the Senate directed that these freedmen should be provided with homes.

Mr. SUMNER. "Homes and employment," and the committee of conference having it under consideration deliberately adopted the phrase "make provision for" as upon the whole a better expression.

Mr. GRIMES. I know the committee of conference deliberately adopted it; but am I to adopt their suggestion when I am satisfied that it is wrong, and that the construction that may be given to it by those who may come after us in the administration of this Government would enable them to reenslave these very freedmen and attach them as serfs to the soil? The Senator says that I have misconstrued the effect of this section. He says there is another section that is to be taken in connection with it, and he refers to the fourth section, which declares:

And every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a free man, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law.

And then he goes on and in the ninth section makes a law by which the officers created under this bill may provide for letting him out for such a period of time as the Commissioner chooses, to whoever he chooses, wherever he chooses, and at such compensation as he chooses. That will be the construction of the section.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish my friend would allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. I really wish to ask my friend whether he imagines that there is any rule of law or of interpretation which would authorize a court or lawyer or anybody else to interpret the ninth section without reference to the rest of the bill? Must it not be taken together, as a whole? Must not one part be seen in the light of the other? And can the person who approaches the ninth section, and especially passing from that section to the fourth section, find anything but liberty and good for the freedmen?

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I will make a candid answer to the Senator, and say that any court and any lawyer, as I apprehend, who might be called upon to construe this law, would find in that clause in this ninth section or the latter part of it, as they would find in a majority of the other sections of the bill, nothing but rhetorical flourishes.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; those would not hurt.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir, they would not hurt, and they would not do any good. The Senator claims that they will be beneficial; that they will restrain and influence the construction to be given to the ninth section. I think they will not. I say that the declaration, speaking of them in another capacity at another time, that they shall be treated as freedmen with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and that no power or control shall be exercised with regard to them except in conformity to law, will have no practical effect, for what is this exception? It is "except in conformity with law."—What law? The law that is embraced in the ninth section of the same bill, which gives to the Commissioner power to make provision for these men at such compensation as he pleases, with whomsoever he pleases, to labor wherever he pleases, and in whatever capacity he pleases.

Now, Mr. President, it will not do for the Senator to raise an issue with me upon that question on the ground that I am not in favor of the rights of the freedmen, or to insinuate that I am not as much in favor of liberty and freedom as he is. Mr. President, if this is such a purely humane bill, why is there no provision to reach the freedmen in this District? Are they not suffering? Do they not need our assistance? Are there not from ten to twelve thousand of them starving right under our eyes to-day? I want a bill such as that introduced by the distinguished chairman of the committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, that will authorize the Secretary of War to reach these persons.

No man has a right to suppose that because I am opposed to the adoption of this conference report I am opposed to any freedman's bill. I want an opportunity to change it. I think that if this question is postponed until to-morrow we can get that opportunity. I want to refer it to another committee of conference. I want to incorporate into it the very provision that is in this House bill, which will authorize the Secretary of War to provide for this colored people in this District. Does the Senator claim that the work of his committee on conference is immaculate? Can it not be rectified? Is it not possible to be bettered? Is all judgment and wisdom in this world, as well as all anti-slavery sentiment and the spirit of freedom, confined to this committee of conference?

Mr. President, I am just as much in earnest as the Senator from Massachusetts is; I am just as much in favor of protecting these freedmen as he is; I will go just as far and spend just as much of my own money or of the money of my constituents as he will spend; but I want to be satisfied that when I am doing it it is going to reach the objects of my bounty, and I want to be satisfied that all their rights will be protected under the law which I am going to adopt and vote for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to postpone the report under consideration until one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Ramsey, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wright—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Farwell, Foster, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Foot, Hale, Harding, Harris, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Salsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wiley—21.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring with the report.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I desire to state before the vote is taken that in my judgment the bill if adopted will, instead of benefiting the freedmen of the South, be attended with consequences sufficient in time to reenslave them. If I understand this proposition, it is to establish an independent Department of the Government to take into consideration the condition of the freedmen, to take charge of them in every sense of the word, to look to their comfort, to act as guardians for them in every respect, to have a vast number of officers appointed for the purpose of overlooking their condition, providing for them labor, and in every way possible superintending their welfare, and I think opening the door for the perfect reenslavement of the negroes of the South. I am very well aware that the Senator from Massachusetts does not think so. I am very well aware that he would not do anything whatever which in his opinion would bring about such a result.

Mr. President, the comment that was made upon this bill by the Senator from Iowa, I think is just, and is amply sufficient to defeat it. What is the ninth section of the bill? In substance it is that whenever these commissioners cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen, they shall make provision for them with humane and suitable persons, and at a just and suitable compensation for their services. Does the Senator from Massachusetts take into consideration the vast number of freedmen to be found in the southern States—from three to three and a half millions? It is intended that the eighty-eight superintendents who are provided for in the bill shall go on to look into the condition of these negroes, and wherever they cannot make otherwise suitable provisions on the lands they may seize upon in the southern States it will be their duty to look out homes for them, and put them with those parties that they see fit to place them under, for such compensation and for such a time as they may desire. What will be the result of this? Will there be enough abandoned lands in the southern States upon which to place the negroes? If that be the case, let us see what is to be done. Look at my own State to-day.

I do not wish now to draw any comparison showing the distinctions that are made here between freedmen and the white refugees from the southern States. There are to-day in my State thousands of individuals from the State of Arkansas, and from the southwest part of Missouri, who are refugees from their homes in consequence of the fact that they were Union men. They are just as poor as the freedmen. One of the sections of this bill, if I remember it aright—I have not had time to devote much attention to it—provides that the assistant commissioners shall take possession of all abandoned property, real and personal, belonging to disloyal persons, and all real estate belonging to the United States, or of which the United States has possession, and shall rent or lease such real estate to freedmen, or permit the same to be cultivated by them, on such terms as they may prescribe; and if the lands or other property shall not be required for the freedmen they may rent or lease the same to other persons. Why not permit these commissioners to look somewhat to the condition of those white men who, in consequence of their Unionism, have been made refugees from home? The bill declares that as long as freedmen may be found to place upon the lands that are abandoned, so long freedmen shall be placed upon them in preference to white persons. Why make this distinction? I would not make any distinction in favor of the whites as against the blacks. Why is a distinction made here in favor of the blacks as against the whites? I should like to know of the Senator what reason there is for it. It is not all the people of the southern States that are secessionists, not all the people of the southern States that have ever been engaged in this rebellion in any way whatever. Many have fled from the oppressions which were imposed upon them in the southern States, and are refugees from home, and are just as poor as the freedmen themselves, as I have before said; and why does the committee say that a preference shall be made in favor of the freedmen over the whites? I can see no reason in the world for it. There is no reason for it.

How is it in my own State? We have very properly freed the negroes in the State. They are upon our hands. In addition, we have thousands and thousands of white persons on our hands to be taken care of; we are compelled to do it; humanity requires that we shall do it; and yet this report makes no provision whatever for them, but leaves them upon the people of a State that has been impoverished by the war, and invasions made upon it for four years, and no provision whatever is made for them, provided there are blacks enough to take up the lands that have been abandoned.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to refer to another provision of this bill, and I wish to appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts and to ask him why it is inserted. These commissioners and superintendents are to act as guardians, and they are to aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages and in the application of their labor. I do not profess to have been an anti-slavery man a great while, but the Senator from Massachusetts is certainly too old an anti-slavery man to have been the author of a proposition of this character. What was the old argument in favor of the institution of slavery? Does not the Senator know; has he not heard it upon the floor of this Chamber often enough to know what it was? It was that the African race is not competent to self-government, that the negro is not able to take care of himself, that he needs a guardian. It always was the argument in favor of the institution of slavery, and is the argument to-day, that he is not qualified to take care of himself, that he needs a guardian, that he wants a next friend in all his conduct in life. Though I am not a very old anti-slavery man, I can say to Senators here that I never believed a word of that argument. I believe to-day that if you turn loose the negroes of the southern States and tell them to take care of themselves they will do it. There is no doubt about it. They will make a better contract for themselves than any white man who is their next friend will make for them. They will make their contracts and collect their wages. They have sense enough to do it. They are intelligent enough to do it; and, Mr. President, I tell you that so far as my experience goes they are as industrious as the white man. They take care of their wages as well as the white man does, and they are just as capable of making contracts.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to say to the Senator, then, that this bill will have no application to such persons. No person need be aided in making a contract unless he stands in need of it. Every person under the bill will be as free as the Senator himself, just as free to make a contract to the right or the left as the Senator from Missouri. It is only if he stands in need of it that he may claim that aid.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that this is made a duty. If my proposition be true that these negroes can take care of themselves, why the necessity of this aid? I want to disabuse any prejudice in the Senator's mind on that subject; he has heard so long from slave-masters that negroes cannot take care of themselves that it has really fastened itself on his brain. I say they can do so. I always told the Senator they could take care of themselves. I have never been of a different opinion. Turn loose the negroes in this country and let them take care of themselves. Take the letter "d" out of that word "freedmen," leave them to be "freemen" and not "freedmen"—I do not like the term; let the "d" be dropped from it. I am opposed to keeping up the idea that these negroes when they have been turned free are to have guardians, supervisors, superintendents, and commissioners to take charge of them.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Overseers.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, "overseers," for they are nothing else. I would say that the terms here used are but another name for overseer.

Now, let us look at another provision of this bill. It is not made the duty of the negroes to take charge of the abandoned farms in the South. The Senator says that if these negroes can take care of themselves they will be just as free as I am. The Senator is mistaken. Why does he make it the duty of these officers to take charge of all the lands in the southern States? Why not let the negroes go and take charge of them themselves? I ask the Senator now, and I ask for an answer, is it possible for a single negro to get possession of a home after the appointment of these superintendents, unless it be their free will to put him upon the land? The superintendents that you send there are to seize on all the abandoned lands.

Let us look at this vast machine. A Department is to be established, with a Commissioner at its head at a salary of $4,000. There is to be a chief clerk at a salary of $2,000, and then two clerks of each class, costing $12,000. We are to create two districts in each State, at the head of which is to be an assistant commissioner, making twenty-two assistant commissioners at $2,500 each, or $55,000. Each assistant commissioner is to appoint four superintendents for his district, making eighty-eight superintendents at $1,500 each, making $132,000; and all this expense is provided for to begin with.

These superintendents are to take charge of all the abandoned lands in the southern States, and not a negro can go and make a home upon them without their consent. Now, I venture to predict that after the machinery of this Department is put into full operation in the southern States, and this vast number of clerks and superintendents shall have been appointed, there will be a system of fraud and swindling that will astound the Senator from Massachusetts. He does not dream that he is building up the machinery of a vast system of fraud and oppression throughout the southern States, but I feel very well satisfied that such will be the case.

The bill says that these superintendents shall take possession of the land and have charge of it. No negro can go and take possession of lands and cultivate them himself. Let me tell the Senator that the negro would be much better off without these superintendents. The negro knows how to cultivate the cotton lands of the South much better than the gentlemen who will be sent down there as superintendents. The negro understands the mode of cultivation infinitely better than the men who will be sent there to superintend his labor. Why then will you have them to direct the negro in the "application" of his labor? He knows how to apply his labor just as well as the superintendents who will be sent there, and who never saw a cotton plant in their lives.

But what else is there? If the lands and other property shall not be required for the freedmen, the officers may rent or lease them to other persons. It is also provided that all contracts of the freedmen are to be in writing. The Senator from Massachusetts knows very well that when a contract is once reduced to writing the writing itself is the evidence of the contract and no oral testimony can be taken against it. Does he not know that nine tenths of the negroes of the southern States cannot read and write? And if these superintendents are permitted to superintend every contract and to make contracts for the negroes, as they will do, does he not know that it will be utterly impossible for the negro in any court of justice anywhere to introduce testimony outside of the contract? These contracts will be made by dishonest superintendents again and again in order to benefit themselves and to rob the negro of the earnings of his labor. Such will be the fact; and the Senator from Massachusetts in less than two years from to-day will discover that what I say is true:

Mr. President, I am not going to take up the time of the Senate. I have said enough to show that this bill ought not to be adopted. That nothing should be adopted, I am not prepared to say; but my opinion is that no bill of this character ought to be adopted. The President of the United States has issued a proclamation freeing the slaves. We regard that proclamation as binding, and consider that the slaves in all the seceded States are free; but if that be not the fact, the constitutional amendment that will soon become a part of the Constitution does make them free; and I undertake to say that it will be the settled policy of this country in the future to regard the negroes as free; and not only will they be regarded as free by the men of the loyal States, but I tell you they are now being regarded as free even by the bitterest of the secessionists of the South. Sir, it cannot be avoided; they will be free; and I say the better policy is to regard them as free, have it understood that we ourselves regard them as freemen, and that they are to be treated as such upon every occasion, and that they need no guardians, no superintendents, no overseers. Sir, if we adopt this policy freedom will become a fixed fact in the country, and I urge upon the Senator from Massachusetts not to insist upon the passage of this bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for a vote at once.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection to the Senator from Massachusetts having a vote when the Senate is full, but this is a very important measure not only in its effect upon the colored race but upon the tax payers of the North. I think, sir, for the last three years quite enough has been done by Congress in the way of creating offices for men who seek office that they may make a living off the public. Now, sir, when we come to establish a Department of this Government, and the vote of the Senate is insisted upon on it, the Senate ought to be full, and I do not think the chairman of the committee, be he ever so earnest in favor of his measure, has a right to demand a vote at this late hour of a day's session of the Senate. The Senator sees that there are very many Senators who are not here. If his bill is right he need not be afraid to submit it to the judgment of a full Senate. If his bill is wrong, it ought not to be supported, it ought to be defeated.

Mr. President, I believe the construction of the Senator from Iowa is right; but suppose it be not right, it is the judgment of a very distinguished Senator, and that judgment is sustained by the judgment of other Senators, that this bill, instead of making the colored people of the South freedmen makes them slaves, places them not under the control of masters whose interest it is to provide for them, but under the control of officers whose interest it may be to make money out of their labor. The Senator who has charge of this bill was not able to meet the argument of the Senator from Iowa, as I thought. Not that he lacks the ability to do so; we all concede his ability; but that the position of the Senator from Iowa was so strong that it could not be shaken.

In one clause of the bill the Senator from Massachusetts provides that these people shall be considered as freemen, and shall be treated according to law, and then provides that an army of officers shall have the control and custody of them. What does the ninth section mean if it does not mean what the Senator from Iowa has said it means? What is the purpose of the bill? What is the object of all this? Nothing, or something. If it means something, it means what the Senator says it means. If it means nothing, we ought not to have a Department established; we ought not to fill the land with officers to be supported by a burdened people. The Senator from Iowa insists that it means that these persons are to be placed under the control and guardianship of an army of office-holders. The language is plain, as I conceive, that "whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen who may come under his care he shall, so far as practicable, make provision for them with humane and suitable persons, at a just compensation for their services." The Senator from Massachusetts says that means if the colored people are willing to do it. If it all depends on their pleasure, why pass the bill? If the judgment of the negro overrides the judgment of the officer, we do not need the bill. If the colored persons are to be entirely free to work for whom they please, and at such wages as they please, why appoint a man to hire them out? If this man cannot hire them out, if this law does not give him the power to do it except with the consent of the negro—in other words, if the negro down South is to make his own bargain, what is the purpose of a Government officer to make a bargain for him? If the officer is to consult the colored person in advance and get his consent to the bargain, then let the colored man make his own contract. If he is free, he makes his own contracts. If he is a slave, I prefer that he should be a slave under the control of a person who is interested to look after him.

Mr. President, I ask Senators to look into what a state of facts may occur under this bill. You appoint a Commissioner; the Senator says he will be an honest man. He may be an honest man, but all officers are not honest. Suppose you appoint a man to take charge of these colored people in the South who is not honest, who seeks to make gain, not for himself it may be, but for his relatives, his friends, men whom he wishes to make rich, and they go down with him and this officer hires out these colored people to the men whom he wishes to provide for and to accommodate; and in that way the most odious system of slavery that is possible may spring up.

But, Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this bill further. I think we ought to have a vote when the Senate is full. I do not believe this bill is the judgment of the Senate. It has not come here, as I esteem it, according to the usages of legislation. It is a bill brought in here by a committee of conference, and we are compelled to vote for it or against it without the power of amendment. It is a system of legislation that we ought not to encourage. It may hit us sometime when we do not want this kind of legislation. Sometime a committee of conference may be appointed by this body and by the other branch of Congress and bring in a report that is entirely opposed to the sentiment of the body in many of its details; and yet we have to vote upon it as an entirety, for or against it, without the power of amendment. We ought to stand strictly by the usage which allows a committee of conference only to report upon questions of disagreement.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] has just suggested that if I give way he will move an adjournment. I do not intend to discuss the bill any further.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope, then, we may have a vote to-night.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would go any extent to accommodate the Senator from Massachusetts; I would be willing to stay here all night myself; but I am not willing that so important a measure as this, a measure establishing a new Department of Government, giving a power that I do not think, under the Constitution, we have a right to give, shall be voted upon by so thin a Senate; but if the Senator wishes to make a motion to adjourn, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WILSON. We have not got a quorum.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Hurlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Sprague, and Wright—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Farwell, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Nye, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Harris, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wiley—26.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 21, 1865.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. JOHN THURSH, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WILSON. I ask leave to have printed a substitute for a bill (H. R. No. 740) to establish the supremacy of the Constitution in the insurrectionary States, which will be reported from the Committee on the Judiciary to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. KASSON. I ask leave to report from the Committee of Ways and Means an amendment to the resolution establishing a Public Printing Office.

The joint resolution was read at length. It authorizes the Superintendent of Public Printing to purchase paper, either by contract or in the open market, at prices not exceeding current rates, as may be most advantageous to the United States, subject to the same rules and regulations as now apply to contracts.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa why that resolution should not be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. KASSON. I would say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BALDWIN] that this matter came before the Committee of Ways and Means in connection with the appropriation for that office, and it was found necessary to amend the law in this way to complete the legislation in relation to that office. The Superintendent of Public Printing is now required to contract for paper for the entire year, without any statement of the quantity. The quantity required, however, is so large that the greater number of the paper manufacturers of this country cannot enter into the competition, their capacity not being equal to the entire amount required. The result has been to diminish competition, and seriously enlarge the expenditures of the office in that respect.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I have no question but some modification of the existing law in regard to these contracts should be made. But this is a matter of much importance, and as the whole matter of printing is one to which the Committee on Printing naturally gives more attention, probably, than any other committee of the House, I should prefer to have this joint resolution go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. KASSON. The time is very short for the consideration of this matter. It has received the approval of the Superintendent of Public Printing.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I think it should receive the approval of the Committee on Printing. I must object to this joint resolution, unless it goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. KASSON. I have no wish to take away the examination of any proper subject from the Committee on Printing. I think it is important that this should be passed this session. If the gentleman insists upon it, I will ask to have it referred to the Committee on Printing.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

LOAN BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask leave to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a loan bill, being a bill to provide ways and means for the support of the Government.

The bill was read at length. It provides for the issuing of five-forty bonds, to an amount not exceeding $600,000,000, with interest in gold at six per cent., or in lawful currency at seven and three tenths per cent. per annum.

Mr. STEVENS. I also ask leave to report a substitute from the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means for the bill just read.

The substitute was read at length. It provides for the issuing of ten-forty bonds to an amount not exceeding $600,000,000, with interest in lawful currency at eight per cent. per annum.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that the bill and substitute be printed, and made the special order for consideration in the House on Thursday next, and from day to day until completed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have no objection if it is considered in the House subject to the same rules in regard to debate, &c., as are applicable to the Committee of the Whole.

The motion of Mr. STEVENS was agreed to.

CHIEF OF STAFF FOR GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for a chief of staff to the Lieutenant General commanding the armies of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. BOYD presented the memorial of the principal chief and others of the Cherokee nation, asking for the payment of interest, &c.; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. COLE, of California. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted to the select committee on the Pacific railroad a bill (H. R. No. 763) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the reading of the bill; and the bill was read at length.

The first section provides that section ten of the act of July 2, 1864, be so modified and amended as to allow the Central Pacific Railroad Company and the Western Pacific Railroad Company of California to issue their six per cent. thirty-years bonds, interest payable in any lawful money of the United States, upon their separate roads. And the companies are authorized to issue, respectively, their bonds to the extent of one hundred miles in advance of a continuous completed line from Sacramento.

Section two provides that the assignment made by the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California to the Western Pacific Railroad Company of that State, of the right to construct all that portion of the railroad and telegraph from the city of San José to the city of Sacramento, is hereby ratified and confirmed to the Western Pacific Railroad Company, with all the privileges and benefits of the several acts of Congress relating thereto, and subject to all the conditions thereof; provided, the time within which the Western Pacific Railroad Company shall be required to construct the first twenty miles of their road shall be one year from the 1st of July, 1865, and that the entire road shall be completed from San José to Sacramento, connecting at the latter point with the Central Pacific railroad, within four years thereafter.

Mr. COLE, of California. This bill is local in its application; it relates only to the California end of the Pacific railroad. It asks nothing of the Government, its object being to remove certain restrictions upon the companies that are building the road, and it will hasten its completion. No one can have any valid objection to its passage; and unless some one desires it I will not take the time of the House in further explanation of it. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion to recommit the bill to the select committee on the Pacific railroad, the motion was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COLE, of California, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON SENATOR HICKS.

Mr. WEBSTER, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the eulogies on Senator Hicks be printed for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

DEBTS DUE THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ALLEY. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of Senate bill No. 424, entitled "An act to facilitate the collection of certain debts due the United States." This bill was reported last Thursday by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and was pending when the morning hour expired.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that in all cases where debts are due from postmasters, mail contractors, or other officers, agents, or employees of the Post Office Department, who are in default or delinquency, a warrant of attachment may issue against all property, possessions, and rights legal, equitable, and contingent, belonging to such officer, and his sureties, or either of them, in the following cases: First. When any such officer, agent, or employee and his sureties or either of them, has, within the meaning of the act of July 17, 1862, chapter one hundred and ninety-five, and the proclamation of the President in pursuance thereof, dated the 25th day of July, 1862, participated in, aided, abetted, or countenanced any rebellion against the United States. Second. When such officer, agent, or employee and his sureties, or either of them, is a non-resident of the district where such officer was appointed, or has departed from such district for the purpose of residing permanently out of such district, or of defrauding the United States, or of avoiding the service of civil process. Third. When such officer or his sureties, or either of them, has conveyed away or is about to convey away his property, or any part thereof, or has removed or is about to remove his property, or any part thereof, from the district wherein the same is situated, with the intent to defraud the United States. And where such removal has taken place certified copies of the warrant may be sent to the marshal of any other district into which such property may have been removed, under which certified copies it shall be lawful for such marshal to seize such property and convey it to some convenient point within the jurisdiction of the court from which the warrant originally issued. Alias warrants may issue upon due application, and the validity of the warrant first issued shall continue until the return day thereof.

The second section provides that application for such warrant may be made by any district attorney or assistant district attorney, or any other person authorized by the Postmaster General, before any judge, or, in his absence, before any clerk of any court of the United States having original jurisdiction of the cause of action. Such application shall be made upon an affidavit of the applicant, or some other credible person, stating the existence of either of the grounds of attachment enumerated in the first section of this act, and upon production of legal evidence of the debt. Upon such application, and upon due order of any judge of the court, or, in the absence of any judge, without such order, the clerk shall issue a warrant for the attachment of all the property of any kind belonging to the party or parties specified in the affidavit, which warrant shall be executed with all possible dispatch by the marshal, who shall take the property attached into his custody, and hold the same subject to all interlocutory or final orders of the court.

The third section provides that the party or parties whose property is attached may, at any time within twenty days before the return day of the warrant, on giving to the district attorney notice of his intention, file a plea in abatement, traversing the allegations of the affidavit, or denying the ownership of the property attached in the defendants, or either of them, in which case the court may, upon application of either party, order an immediate trial by jury of the issues raised by the affidavit and plea. But the parties may by consent, waive a trial by jury, in which case the court shall decide the issues raised by the affidavit and plea. Any party claiming ownership of the property attached and a specific return of the same shall be confined to the remedy afforded by this act, but his right to an action of trespass or other action for damages shall not be impaired hereby.

The fourth section enacts that when the property attached shall be sold on any interlocutory order of the court, or when it shall be producing any revenue, the money arising from such sale or revenue shall be invested in securities of the United States, under the order of the court, and all accretions shall be held subject to the order of the court.

The fifth section provides that immediately upon the execution of the warrant of attachment the marshal shall cause due publication of such attachment to be made, in the case of absconding debtors or adherents of the rebellion, for two months, and in case of non-residents for four months. Such publication shall be made in some newspaper or newspapers within the district where the property attached is situated, and the details of such publication shall be regulated in each case by the order under which the warrant is issued.

The sixth section provides that after the first publication of such notice of attachment in all the newspapers required by this or any subsequent act, every person indebted to the defendants, or either of them, and having knowledge of such notice, whose property is liable to attachment, and every person having possession of any property belonging to such defendants, or either of them, and having knowledge as aforesaid, shall account and answer for the amount of such debt and for the value of such property, and any disposal or attempt to dispose of any such property to the injury of the United States shall be illegal and void. When the person or persons so indebted to or having possession of the property of such defendants, or either of them, shall be known to the district attorney or the marshal, it shall be the duty of such officer to see that personal notice of such attachment is served upon such persons, as in cases of garnishees; but the want of such notice shall not invalidate the attachment.

The seventh section enacts that upon application of the party whose property has been attached the court or any judge thereof may discharge the warrant of attachment as to the property of the applicant; provided, that such applicant shall enter into and execute to the United States a good and sufficient penal bond in double the amount of the value of the property attached, conditioned for the return of said property, or to answer any judgment which may be rendered by the court in the premises, which bond shall be approved by the court or any judge thereof.

The eighth section provides that the fees, costs, and expenses of issuing and serving the warrants of attachment authorized by this act shall be regulated as far as possible by the existing laws of the United States and the rules of court made in pursuance thereof. In the case of preliminary trials as to the validity of the attachment or the right of property, clerks' and marshals' fees shall be the same as in ordinary cases, and the docket fee of the district attorney shall be ten dollars.

The ninth section enacts that this act shall not be construed so as to limit or abridge in any manner such rights of the United States as have accrued or been allowed in any district under the former practice of the United States courts or the adoption of State laws by said courts.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, with amendments, Senate bill No. 390, entitled "An act relating to the postal laws."

The bill was read.

The first section provides that all domestic letters (except letters lawfully franked, and duly certified letters of soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service of the United States) which are deposited for mailing in any post office of the United States, either wholly unpaid or short paid to the extent of more than a single rate of postage, shall be returned without delay to the writers by the postmaster at the office where deposited, with the stamps uncanceled, and notice of the amount of deficient postage due thereon; such letters to be returned by the postmasters unopened, when the writers are known; and opened only in cases where the writers are not known. But insufficiently prepaid letters deposited in any post office, which are short paid a single rate of postage only, shall be forwarded to destination charged with the unpaid single rate, to be collected on delivery.

The second section enacts that from and after the 1st day of January, 1866, the rates of postage chargeable upon newspapers and periodical publications of all kinds, issued from a known office of publication at stated periods and sent to regular subscribers, shall be prepaid at the time of mailing, under such rules and regulations as the Postmaster General shall prescribe; and thereafter no printed matter of any kind, whether transient or sent to regular subscribers, (except printed matter received in the mails from foreign countries, or such as is specially exempted from postage charges by acts of Congress,) shall be admitted into the mails of the United States, unless the full postage chargeable thereon is prepaid.

The third section provides that the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the relief of postmasters who have been robbed by confederate forces or rebel guerrillas," approved April 29, 1864, shall be extended to cases of loyal postmasters where, by reason of the presence of armed forces, a post office is destroyed and the postmaster loses the fixtures and furniture or postage stamps and stamped envelopes; and also to cases where such losses are occasioned by armed forces other than those of the so-called confederate States.

The fourth section enacts that, in addition to the items of rent, fuel, light, and clerks enumerated in the fifth section of the act approved July 1, 1864, the Postmaster General be authorized to allow, at his discretion, out of the revenues of the office at New York, and of offices of the first, second, and third classes, a just and reasonable sum for the necessary cost, in whole or in part, as well of the foregoing items, as of furniture, stationery, printing, and other items of expenditure required at offices of those classes, to be adjusted upon a satisfactory exhibit of the facts; and that he be authorized to pay, out of the proceeds of the money-order business, the cost of stationery and such other incidental expenses as are necessary to the transaction of that business.

The fifth section provides for amending the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to the Post Office Department," approved March 3, 1863, so as to authorize the Postmaster General to allow for the publication, in newspapers, of the list of non-delivered letters at any post office, compensation at a rate not to exceed two cents for each letter so advertised.

The sixth section proposes to amend the seventeenth section of the act entitled "An act to establish salaries for postmasters, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1864, so as to restore, from the date of its passage, to the special agent of the Post Office Department in the Pacific States and Territories, his regular salary of $2,500 per annum, under act of March 2, 1861, with an allowance, in addition thereto, of a sum not exceeding five dollars per diem, to provide for his actual traveling and incidental expenses while actively employed in the service. It also proposes to authorize the Postmaster General to appoint an additional special agent for the Pacific States and Territories, and two additional special agents to superintend postal matters connected with the railway mail service of the United States, who shall receive the same salary and per diem allowance for traveling and incidental expenses, to be paid out of the appropriation for mail transportation.

The seventh section enacts that hereafter special agents of the Post Office Department, other than those appointed for the Pacific States and Territories, or those appointed under the authority of the seventh section of this act to superintend postal matters connected with the railway service of the United States, shall be allowed for their necessary traveling and incidental expenses, while actually employed in the service, a sum not exceeding four dollars per diem.

The eighth section authorizes the Postmaster General to pay, out of the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses, the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be required, for defraying the necessary expense of preparing and publishing a set of post route maps, arranged by States and groups of States, and showing all the permanent mail routes, distances, and post offices thereon in the United States, with other statistical information.

The ninth section provides that for the purpose of assorting and distributing letters and other mail matter in railway post offices, the Postmaster General may, from time to time, appoint clerks, who shall be paid out of the appropriation for mail transportation; provided, that the salary of each head clerk so appointed and employed shall not exceed $1,400 per annum, and that the salary of other clerks shall not exceed $1,200 each per annum.

The tenth section proposes to modify the provisions of the fourth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1861," approved June 15, 1860, so as to authorize the Postmaster General to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports, or between ports of the United States, touching at a foreign port, by steamship, allowing and paying therefor, if by an American vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage, and if by a foreign vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea postage on the mails so conveyed.

The eleventh section enacts that no steamship or other vessel departing from a United States for a foreign port or ports, shall be permitted to receive on board, or convey, any letters or letter packets originating in the United States, which have not been regularly posted at, and received from, the post office at the port of departure; and it is made the duty of the collector or other officer of the port empowered to grant clearances of vessels, to require, as a condition of clearance, from the master or commander of such steamship or vessel, an oath of affirmation that he has not received on board his ship or vessel, and has not under his care or within his control, and will not receive and convey, any letters or letter packets addressed to a foreign country, except as herein-after accepted, which have not been delivered to him from the post office at the port of departure. It is also provided that this section shall not apply to any letters or letter packets which relate to the cargo and are addressed to the owner or consignee of such steamship or other vessel, or to any letters or packets which are inclosed in a United States stamped envelope of a denomination sufficient in amount to cover the United States postage legally chargeable thereon if such letters or packets had been posted and transmitted by the regular mail.

The twelfth section provides that nothing contained in the act to establish a postal money-order system, approved May 17, 1864, or in any other act, shall be so construed as to prevent deputy postmasters at money-order or other offices from depositing in the national banks designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as public depositories, to their own credit as deputy postmasters, money-order or other funds in their charge, under the direction of the Postmaster General, nor to prevent their negotiating drafts, orders, or other evidences of debt through these banks, as they may be instructed and required by the Postmaster General.

The thirteenth section enacts that the balance which may remain unexpended of the appropriation of $100,000 to meet any deficiencies in the proceeds of the money-order system during the present fiscal year, under the thirteenth section of the act approved May 17, 1864, may be used, as far as may be necessary, to supply deficiencies in the proceeds of the aforesaid system during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1865.

The fourteenth section provides that, if any person or persons shall willfully and maliciously injure, tear down, or destroy any letter-box, pillar-box, or other receiving boxes established by authority of the Postmaster General of the United States for the safe deposit of matter for the mails and for delivery; or shall willfully aid and assist in injuring, tearing down, or destroying any such box or boxes, every such offender, being thereof duly convicted, shall, for every such offense, be finer not less than $100, nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not less than one year, nor more than three years, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense. And if any clerk or other person employed in any of the departments of the Post Office establishment shall willfully and unlawfully remove from any letter posted at or received in any post office or branch post office, established by authority of the Postmaster General of the United States, any postage stamp or stamps affixed thereto in payment of postage; every such offender, being thereof duly convicted, shall, for every such offense, be fined not more than $100, or imprisoned not more than six months, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense.

The fifteenth section provides that the yearly advertisement for proposals to carry the mails of the United States shall be published hereafter for a period of six weeks in one or more, but not to exceed five, newspapers, printed in the State or Territory where the mail service is to be performed, one of which shall be printed at the seat of government of such State or Territory.

The sixteenth section provides that nothing contained in the act to amend the laws relating to the Post Office Department, approved March 3, 1863, shall be so construed as to repeal or modify the second section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1861," for the delivery of letters and other mail matter, from post offices where the system of free delivery by carriers has not been established; provided, that the system of free delivery shall be established in every place containing a population of fifty thousand within the delivery of the office thereof, and at such other places as the Postmaster General in his judgment shall direct; and also that the prepayment postage on drop letters in all places where free delivery is not established shall be one cent only.

The seventeenth section enacts that no obscene book, pamphlet, picture, print, or other publication of a vulgar and indecent character, shall be admitted into the mails of the United States; but all such obscene publications deposited in or received at any post office, or discovered in the mails, shall be seized and destroyed or otherwise disposed of, as the Postmaster General shall direct. And any person or persons who shall deposit or cause to be deposited in any post office or branch post office of the United States, for mailing or for delivery, an obscene book, pamphlet, picture, print, or other publication, knowing the same to be of a vulgar and indecent character, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, being duly convicted thereof, shall for every such offense be fined not more than $500, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill is of considerable length, and contains many important provisions. It has passed the Senate almost unanimously; and it is agreed to by the House committee by a unanimous vote with the modifications which the amendments now proposed furnish. I will not, therefore, detain the House by any extended remarks; and if no further explanation is desired, I will ask for its immediate passage.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was to strike out in the first section all after the enacting clause.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment reported by the committee, was to strike out in the eighth line of the third section the word "and," and insert after the word "third" the words "and fourth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The third amendment reported by the committee was to strike out in the thirteenth line of the fifth section the word "five," and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

The amendment was agreed to.

The fourth amendment reported by the committee was to strike out in the tenth line of the sixth section the word "five," and insert the word "three."

The amendment was agreed to.

The last amendment reported by the committee was to strike out the words "and risk" after the word "credit" in the ninth line of the eleventh section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT CLERKSHIPS.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, with amendments, a bill (S. No. 389) relating to clerkships in the Post Office Department.

The bill was read. It proposes to amend the third section of an act of Congress making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1854, approved March 3, 1853, so as to authorize the appointment of a chief clerk in the offices of each of the three Assistant Postmasters General, at a salary of $2,000 per annum each.

The second section proposes to authorize the Postmaster General, in lieu of the temporary clerks now employed in the Post Office Department and paid out of the appropriation for postage stamps and stamped envelopes and the proceeds of sales of waste paper, to appoint two clerks of class three, two clerks of class two, and five clerks of class one.

The third section appropriates the sum of $18,000 to pay the clerks provided for in the two preceding sections.

The fourth section appropriates the sum of $6,000 for the payment of such temporary clerks as the Postmaster General may, from time to time, deem necessary.

The fifth section provides that unclaimed money in dead letters for which no owner can be found, and also all money derived from sales of waste paper or other public property in post offices or the Post Office Department, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, under the direction of the Postmaster General, for the service of the Post Office Department; and any postmaster or clerk in a post office, or any other clerk, officer, or agent of the Post Office Department, having temporary custody of such money, and failing to deposit it as herein provided, is to be deemed to be guilty of a felony, and be subject to a fine not exceeding double the sum so retained by such clerk or other agents, or imprisonment not exceeding three years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was to strike out the third and fourth sections, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the said clerks shall be paid out of any moneys heretofore appropriated or that may hereafter be appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment reported by the committee was to strike out in the tenth line of the fifth section the word "failing," and insert in lieu thereof the words "willfully neglecting."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST ROADS.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," which was read a first and second time, and considered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MINOR HEIRS OF B. A. BAILEY.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported adversely upon the bill (H. R. No. 658) entitled "An act for the benefit of the minor heirs of B. A. Bailey, deceased," which was laid on the table.

BENONI STAATS.

Mr. ALLEY also, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported adversely upon the petition of Benoni Staats, praying that the pay of his mail contract may be increased. The petition was laid on the table.

WILLIAM H. SCOTT.

Mr. ALLEY also, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported adversely upon the petition of William H. Scott for indemnity for loss sustained by the failure and refusal of the Postmaster General to give him a mail contract according to agreement.

The petition was laid on the table.

NORTON'S STAMP CANCELER.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, moved that leave be granted to Shavor & Corse to withdraw their papers from the files of the House relating to Norton's postmarking and canceling stamp.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL MISSISSIPPI BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. NORTON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back House bill No. 634, to incorporate the National Mississippi Bridge Company, and demanded the previous question on its adoption.

The bill was read.

Mr. PENDLETON. Has that bill ever been printed?

Mr. NORTON. The bill has not been printed. Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the gentleman will not press the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. NORTON. The bridge is to be built seventy feet above the highest water mark.

Mr. PENDLETON. At what point does the bridge cross the Mississippi river?

Mr. NORTON. From Illinois to St. Louis.

Mr. PENDLETON. Has authority been given by these States of Illinois and Missouri to build this bridge?

Mr. NORTON. Yes, sir; by both States.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand authority is given to this company to condemn property.

Mr. NORTON. Under the laws of Missouri on one side and under the laws of Illinois on the other side.

Mr. PENDLETON. Is this bridge company authorized to condemn property lying in those States for the purpose of building this bridge?

Mr. NORTON. Charters have been granted by both States and companies have been incorporated for the purpose of building this bridge.

The bill provides that lands may be taken for the purpose of building the bridge in accordance with the laws of Missouri on one side and the laws of Illinois on the other side. No authority is given other than that.

Mr. PENDLETON. I speak with no positiveness in regard to the provisions of this bill except as I heard them read at the Clerk's desk; but I heard no such limitation as that the gentleman indicates put upon the power to condemn property.

Mr. NORTON. It is there, for I examined the bill very carefully myself. It was introduced and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads by the gentleman from the St. Louis district, [Mr. Knox,] and it was considered deliberately by that committee, and I was instructed unanimously to report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let me express the hope that with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois this bill will not now be put on its passage. It may be perfectly right, but I do not know that it is. The gentleman says that it has received the attention of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and their approval would commend it to the House; but as it was read at the Clerk's desk I thought there were provisions in it extraordinary in their character, such as we have not been in the habit of putting into laws of this kind, and such as I do not think this House can properly consider without having the bill before it. I am not able at this moment to particularize these provisions. One is that this company shall have power to acquire title to land necessary for the construction of the bridge, and for the approaches to it from public highways, and the same power to take materials from lands in the neighborhood for the construction thereof; and the proceedings thereon shall be conducted in the same manner as is provided in cases to authorize the formation of railroad associations and to regulate the same by the State laws of Illinois and Missouri respectively. There a substantive power is given by this Congress to this association to go into the States and condemn property lying within the limits of the States. The only thing necessary for them to do is to pursue the course of proceedings indicated by the State laws. It seems to me that that is a provision not contained ordinarily in bills of this character. I beg the gentleman, without meaning to take up time or interfering with his right to call the previous question, to have the bill printed so that we may consider it.

Mr. NORTON. I have no objection to that if it is made the special order for a day certain. It seems to me that the gentleman's objection to the bill is answered by the very language he quoted from it. Whatever property is taken for the building of this bridge is to be taken in accordance with the State laws of Missouri on one side and the laws of Illinois on the other. The bill was framed with a great deal of care; and while I feel willing to accommodate the gentleman, under the circumstances I must demand the previous question.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to appeal to my colleague to let this bill be printed. I am satisfied it will be defeated if he does not.

Mr. NORTON. Gentlemen all around me say I cannot get this bill made a special order at this stage of the session, and it seems to me the only chance is to put it upon its passage now.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I shall then be compelled to vote against the bill, not having had an opportunity to know what it is. Unless it is printed I certainly shall do what I can to defeat it.

Mr. NORTON. I do not know that my colleague wants to vote for the bill anyhow.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I do, if upon examination I think it ought to pass.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I hope the gentleman will allow it to be printed.

Mr. NORTON. I would have no objection to having it printed if it could be done without losing the bill. I should indeed prefer to have it done. But the immense accumulation of business, and the statement of gentlemen around me that objection will be made to having this bill made a special order, forbid it, because the passing of it over for the purpose of having it printed is tantamount to having it defeated. I will consent, however, to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed, provided that the committee may have leave to report at any time.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object. I have been trying to get up the enrollment bill, which has been a special order for some time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state, for the general information of the House, that there are now, beside the special assignment for to-day, six special orders and six motions to reconsider pending. How soon they will be exhausted the Chair cannot state.

Mr. NORTON. Very well; those who are most interested in the bill are satisfied that I ought not to give time at present. I cannot get the bill made a special order, and I cannot get leave for the committee to report at any time; and I am consequently compelled to insist upon my demand for the previous question.

Mr. GRISWOLD. We want to know what the bill is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has not the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads the right to report again to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. Their time to report expires to-day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall call for the reading of the enrolled bill, if it is put on its passage.

Mr. NORTON. I insist on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. FINCK. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 78, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, Olney, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Denison, Edney, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harrington, Charles M. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Seofield, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Starr, Stuart, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, John D. Baldwin, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Steele, Sweet, Tracy, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—58.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. NORTON. I ask that the bill may be printed.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Hickey, their Chief Clerk, announced to the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. No. 222) to extinguish the Indian title to lands in the Territory of Utah suitable for agricultural and mineral purposes.

Also, that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a joint resolution of the following title:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the title to certain property in Carson City and Territory of Nevada, for the purposes of a branch mint located in said place.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions and a bill of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 85) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Secretary of the Interior $250,000, in lieu of certain bonds, for feeding certain refugee Indians;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 111) to encourage the employment of disabled and discharged soldiers;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 112) for the relief of James B. Royce; Joint resolution (S. R. No. 116) for the relief of Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, late of Richmond, Virginia; and

An act (S. No. 386) to incorporate the National Protection Insurance Company of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution to continue the joint committee on the conduct of the war.

RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The next bill in order is House bill No. 602, known as the reconstruction bill, upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Edgerton] is entitled to the floor for twelve minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to extending the time of the gentleman half an hour.

Mr. ASHLEY. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Say twenty minutes. I hope the gentleman will not object to that.

Mr. ASHLEY. I object to any extension.

Mr. EDGERTON. I do not desire to occupy the floor unless I can have twenty minutes additional time.

Mr. ASHLEY. There are half a dozen gentlemen upon this side of the House who desire to speak, and I cannot yield an additional moment.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that objection. We granted the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] more additional time than that yesterday.

Mr. ASHLEY. I have utterly refused to yield to any gentleman upon this side of the House.

Mr. GANSON. I move that gentlemen who desire to speak upon the subject have leave to print their remarks.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. Does that cut off debate? The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. PENDLETON. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he include in his motion that there shall be no debate.

The SPEAKER. That will hardly be in order.

Mr. COX. How long does that permission to print speeches last?

The SPEAKER. Until the 4th of March at noon.

Mr. ASHLEY. I withdraw the motion which I made to recommit the bill to the committee on rebellious States; and I withdraw, by authority of the committee, the bill which was the original text, and introduce the following bill, in lieu thereof:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That in the States declared in rebellion against the United States, the President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint for each a provisional governor, whose pay and emoluments shall not exceed that of a brigadier general of volunteers, who shall be charged with the civil administration of such State, until a State government therein shall be recognized as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That until the United States shall have recognized a republican form of State government, the provisional governor in each of said States shall see that this act, and the laws of the United States, and the laws of the State for the protection of persons and property in force when the State government was overthrown by the rebellion, are faithfully executed within the State; but no law or usage whereby any person was heretofore held in involuntary servitude shall be recognized or enforced by any court or officer in such State; and the laws for the government, trial, and punishment of white persons shall extend to all persons, and jurors shall have the qualifications of voters under this law for delegates to the convention. The President shall appoint such officers provided for by the laws of the State when its government was overthrown as he may find necessary to the civil administration of the State, all which officers shall be entitled to receive the fees and emoluments provided by the State laws for such officers.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all persons held to involuntary servitude or labor in the States or parts of States in which such persons have been declared free by any proclamation of the President, are hereby emancipated and discharged therefrom, and they and their posterity shall be forever free. And if any such persons or their posterity shall be restrained of liberty, under pretense of any claim to such service or labor, the courts of the United States shall, on habeas corpus, discharge them.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person declared free by this act, or any law of the United States, or any proclamation of the President, be restrained of liberty, with intent to be held in or reduced to involuntary servitude or labor, the person convicted before a court of competent jurisdiction of such act shall be punished by fine of not less than $1,500, and be imprisoned not less than five nor more than twenty years.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and the laws of the United States, the provisional governor shall direct the marshal of the United States, as speedily as may be, to name a sufficient number of deputies, and to enroll all white male citizens of the United States resident in the State in their respective counties, and to request each one to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and in his enrollment to designate those who take and those who refuse to take that oath, which rolls shall be forthwith returned to the provisional governor; and if the persons taking that oath shall, together with the citizens of the United States from such State in the military or naval service of the United States, amount to a majority of the persons enrolled in the State, he shall, by proclamation, invite the loyal people of the State to elect delegates to a convention charged to declare the will of the people of the State relative to the reestablishment of a State government, subject to and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the convention shall consist of as many members as both Houses of the last constitutional State Legislature, apportioned by the provisional governor among the counties, parishes, or districts of the State, in proportion to the population enrolled by the marshal, in compliance with the provisions of this act, or in the military or naval service of the United States as aforsaid. The provisional governor shall, by proclamation, declare the number of delegates to be elected by each county, parish, or election district; name a day of election, not less than thirty days thereafter; designate the places of voting in each county, parish, or district, conforming, as nearly as may be convenient, to the places used in the State elections next preceding the rebellion; appoint one or more commissioners to hold the election at each place of voting, and provide an adequate force to keep the peace during the election.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all citizens of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, residents of the State, who are in the military or naval service of the United States, and all who have been honorably discharged therefrom, together with all loyal citizens enrolled as aforesaid, who shall take and subscribe the oath of allegiance to the United States, prescribed in the act of July 2, 1862, shall be electors, and may vote for delegates to the convention hereinbefore authorized, in the county, parish, or district in which they reside, and all such citizens of the United States who are in the military or naval service of the United States shall vote at the headquarters of their respective commands, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the provisional governor for the taking and return of their votes; but no person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the rebel usurpation, or who has voluntarily borne arms against the United States, shall vote or be eligible to be elected as delegate at such election.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners, or either of them, shall hold the election in conformity with this act, and, so far as may be consistent therewith, shall proceed in the manner used in the State prior to the rebellion. The oath of allegiance shall be taken and subscribed on the poll-book by every voter in the form above prescribed, but every person known by or proved to the commissioners to have held or exercised any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the rebel usurpation, or to have voluntarily borne arms against the United States, shall be excluded though he offer to take the oath; and in case any person who shall have borne arms against the United States shall offer to vote, he shall be deemed to have borne arms voluntarily unless he shall prove the contrary by the testimony of a qualified voter. The poll-book, showing the name and oath of each voter, shall be returned to the provisional governor by the commissioners of election or the one acting, and the provisional governor shall canvass such returns, and declare the person having the highest number of votes elected.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the provisional governor shall, by proclamation, convene the delegates elected as aforesaid, at the capital of the State, on a day not more than three months after the election, giving at least thirty days' notice of such day. In case the said capital shall in his judgment be unfit, he shall in his proclamation appoint another place. He shall preside over the deliberations of the convention, and administer to each delegate, before taking his seat in the convention, the oath of allegiance to the United States in the form hereinbefore prescribed.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the convention shall declare, on behalf of the people of the State, their submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and shall adopt the following provisions, hereby prescribed by the United States in the execution of the constitutional duty to guaranty a republican form of government to every State, and incorporate them in the constitution of the State, that is to say: First. No person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, except civil offices merely ministerial and military offices below the grade of colonel, State or confederate, under the usurping power, shall vote for or be a member of the Legislature or Governor. Second. Involuntary servitude is forever prohibited, and freedom and equality of civil rights before the law are guarantied to all persons in said State. Third. No debt, State or confederate, created by or under the sanction of the usurping power, or in any manner in aid thereof, shall be recognized or paid by the State.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That when the convention shall have adopted those provisions, it shall proceed to reestablish a republican form of government, and ordain a constitution containing those provisions, which, when adopted, the convention shall by ordinance provide for submitting to the people of the State entitled to vote under this law, at an election to be held in the manner prescribed by the act for the election of delegates, but at a time and place named by the convention, at which election the said electors, and none other, shall vote directly for or against such constitution and form of State government. And the returns of said election shall be made to the provisional governor, who shall canvass the same in the presence of the electors, and if a majority of the votes cast be for the constitution and form of government, he shall certify the same, with a copy thereof, to the President of the United States, who, after obtaining the assent of Congress, by act or joint resolution, shall, by proclamation, recognize the government so established, and none other, as the constitutional government of the State; and from the date of such recognition, and not before, Senators and Representatives and electors for President and Vice President may be elected in such State, according to the laws of the State and of the United States.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That if the convention shall refuse to reestablish the State government on the conditions aforesaid, the provisional governor shall declare it dissolved; but it shall be the duty of the President, whenever he shall have reason to believe that a sufficient number of the people of the State entitled to vote under this act, in number not less than a majority of those enrolled as aforesaid, are willing to reestablish a State government on the conditions aforesaid, to direct the provisional governor to order another election of delegates to a convention for the purpose and in the manner prescribed in this act, and to proceed in all respects as hereinbefore provided, either to dissolve the convention or to certify the State government reestablished by it to the President.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if the persons exercising the functions of Governor and Legislature under the rebel usurpation in any State heretofore declared to be in rebellion shall, before armed resistance to the national Government is suppressed in such State, submit to the authority of the United States, and take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and adopt by law the third provision prescribed in the eighth section of this act, and ratify the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by Congress to the Legislatures of the several States on the 31st day of January, A. D. 1865, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to recognize the said Governor and Legislature as the lawful State government of such State, and to certify the fact to Congress for its recognition: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall operate to disturb the boundary lines of any State heretofore recognized by and now represented in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I would inquire what effect that substitution will have upon the pending amendments?

Mr. ASHLEY. They all fall with it.

Mr. WILSON. I desire that the substitute I offered shall hold its original place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the right of a committee to withdraw a bill they have reported and substitute another in its place is a new question. The gentleman had consent some days since to substitute the bill which has been pending for the original bill, and which has stood as the original text. The gentleman now claims a right, by the authority of the committee, to withdraw that bill and substitute another in its place. A gentleman upon the floor would have a right, having a bill pending before the House, to modify it at any time previous to a vote. The only question in the mind of the Chair is whether the chairman of a committee, or a gentleman representing a committee, would have the same right by the authority of the committee. The Chair is of opinion that he would; that he would have the right, when speaking by the direct authority of the committee, to have his bill stand upon the same footing as a member would have if he had a bill before the House. But the Chair does not think that it should cut off pending amendments, and he therefore rules that the gentleman, having been so directed by his committee, has the right to substitute this bill, so that the committee can have the action of the House upon the bill as they desire it; and that the amendments still apply to the bill, so that those who moved them can have the sense of the House upon them. Otherwise gentlemen could always get rid of amendments, after debating a bill to which amendments were proposed, by withdrawing it, substituting another, demanding the previous question, and cutting off all power to amend. The Chair rules, therefore, that the amendments are pending.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to modify my substitute.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to modify my amendment so that it shall provide for striking out the word "white" in line eight, section five, of the bill.

FALL OF CHARLESTON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a dispatch from the Secretary of War, which was read, as follows:

[Received 8.35 a.m., February 21, 1865.]

CHARLESTON, S. C., February 18, 1865.
Via NEW YORK, February 21.

GENERAL: The city of Charleston and all its defenses came into our possession this morning, with about two hundred pieces of good artillery and a supply of fine ammunition. The enemy commenced evacuating all the works last night, and Mayor Macbeth surrendered the city to the troops of General Schimmelfennig at nine o'clock this morning, at which time it was occupied by our forces.

Our advance on the Edisto and from Bull's bay hastened the retreat.

The cotton warehouses, arsenals, quartermaster's stores, railroad bridges, and two iron-clads were burnt by the enemy. Some vessels in the ship-yard were also burnt. Nearly all the inhabitants remaining behind belong to the poorer classes.

Very respectfully,
Q. A. GILLMORE,
Major General Commanding.
Major General H. W. HALLECK, Chief of Staff.

[Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. WILSON. I modify my amendment so that it will read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That Senators and Representatives shall not be received from any State heretofore declared in rebellion against the United States until Congress, by concurrent action of both Houses, shall have first declared a just local government, republican in form, to have been organized therein, and such State to be entitled to representation in the respective Houses of Congress.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire to modify my amendment so that it will read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the States declared to be in rebellion against the United States, and within which the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States has been overthrown, shall not be permitted to resume their political relations with the Government of the United States, until, by action of the loyal citizens within such States respectively, a State constitution shall be ordained and established, republican in form, forever prohibiting involuntary servitude within said State, and guarantying to all persons freedom and equal rights before the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. ASHLEY. I call the previous question on the pending bill and amendments.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will it be in order to move to postpone this bill till the 5th of March next, and leave to General Sherman to reconstruct as he is now doing in South Carolina?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose this whole subject is debatable under my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the rule on that point.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of all motions to amend."

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The first question was upon the motion of Mr. HOLMAN, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is well known to the House and the country that from the outbreak of the rebellion I have given this subject of reconstruction special attention. At the last session of Congress, the committee of which I am a member reported a bill which received the sanction of this body and of the Senate, but failed to receive the approval of the President. Since that time, and during this session, it has been my earnest desire to conciliate all gentlemen on this side of the House who had scruples in regard to the bill as it originally passed, and, if possible, to secure a united vote in its favor. For that purpose I consented to what might properly be termed a compromise, in providing for the readmission or recognition of the new governments of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee. The conditions were not such as I would prescribe if those States stood separately and alone. But in order to secure what I thought of paramount importance—universal suffrage to the liberated black men of the South—I consented to ingraft in the bill which I had the honor of proposing the other day a conditional recognition of the existing governments of the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, and the government now being organized in Tennessee.

Disappointed in my efforts to secure the co-operation of gentlemen who profess to entertain, and who I am willing to concede do entertain, practically the same opinions which I do in favor of securing universal suffrage to the colored man, and in favor of the early recognition of every rebel State which has a population sufficient to sustain and maintain a government; failing in that, I now decline to offer my substitute, and at the request and with the concurrence of the committee we have offered the bill of the last session, with the modifications which members will notice when the bill is read. Those modifications are to strike out all the bill contains to which gentlemen have raised objection, in that it seemingly authorized the execution of the State laws as they existed at the time of the rebellion. In order to make perfectly clear what the committee meant, they have inserted a provision that the provisional governor shall execute only such laws as relate to the protection of persons and property; and that all laws inconsistent with this bill, and all laws recognizing the relation of master and slave, shall not be enforced.

The committee have also in this bill omitted the section which authorized the collection of taxes in the State, thus leaving the original bill of last session to stand with those modifications, and with the addition of the thirteenth section of the amendment which I offered yesterday.

I prefer to stand there. I prefer not to offer my substitute, and thus commit myself to a recognition of the governments of Louisiana and Arkansas, unless I can secure that which I think of paramount importance in the reorganization of the other States, and which I felt confident would follow in these States if they were recognized even with their present form of government. For these reasons, I have declined to offer the substitute which I had printed on Saturday, and which was yesterday distributed to the House in pamphlet form.

It is very clear to my mind that no bill providing for the reorganization of loyal State governments in the rebel States can pass this Congress. I am pretty sure that this bill and all the amendments and substitutes offered will fail to command a majority of this House.

We have learned, Mr. Speaker, in the course of the debate on this question, how easy it is for gentlemen to follow in the beaten track in which they have been educated. The individuality of the great majority on our side of the House is so strong that no concession, no compromise, can be made which will bring us together on this great question. Many gentlemen on this side of the House are capital leaders in the minority, are good at pulling down, but not so good at leading majorities, and building up.

On this great question, a question of more magnitude and importance to the people of this country than any other, the majority of this House, I regret to acknowledge, are utterly unable to agree.

While I accord to other gentlemen all the earnestness and all the honesty of purpose which I claim for myself, I do not desire to put myself on the record in favor of admitting these States which have no loyal populations at their back—which have no established governments that I care to recognize; and I only consented conditionally to recognize them because I knew we could hold them up with the military power until the rebellion should be crushed.

I did not expect, Mr. Speaker, to participate in the debate this morning. I did not intend to participate in it at all. Until this debate was opened yesterday I thought that we were all so nearly united at the last session that when the concessions which I have made in this substitute should be presented to gentlemen, there would be no need of argument, no need to consume the valuable time of the House at this late hour of the session, as we did yesterday, and have thus far today. I am not, therefore, prepared to go on with any lengthy remarks. I want to say, however, one word in defense of the last section of the present bill, which is the thirteenth section of my substitute.

Some gentlemen think it strange that such a section should emanate from me. Now, Mr. Speaker, while I have always been earnest and anxious for the restoration of these governments in the South, I have desired, first of all, to secure such governments as would be stable, such governments as would be a source of strength instead of weakness to the national Government. Hence I desire their organization upon the ideas which I have presented in my substitute of Saturday. I have not been opposed, as some gentlemen have seemed to think, to the recognition of any of these States. This thirteenth section is introduced into this bill for the purpose of sustaining the proclamation of the President, which is outstanding today, embodying these very ideas, and to have it go forth from this body in an authoritative form, saying to the legislative and executive authorities in the rebel States that if, before the rebellion be suppressed by force of arms they will take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and command the citizens of their States now in the rebel army to lay down their arms, the President may lawfully and rightfully treat with them and recognize them as the existing government, provided they adopt the provision prescribed in the eighth section of this bill and ratify the proposed amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery.

This much, Mr. Speaker, I think we have the right to exact of the rebel States, after what this nation has suffered from their acts. We cannot obtain indemnity for the past, but it is the duty of statesmen, the duty of men charged with the reconstruction of governments in these rebel States, to demand security for the future, and to that extent I propose to go in this thirteenth section of the bill now before the House. If I were a Union man in the State of Georgia or in the State of North Carolina to-day, I would welcome a declaration, such as is contained in the thirteenth section of this bill, by the American Congress. I would welcome it, and I would use it, as I know, if this bill could be passed, it will be used there among the honest Union men of the South, the men who desire to return to the support of the national Government and to be once more recognized as part of the governing power of the country. For these reasons the committee have added that section to the bill. It is substantially the bill of the last session with these modifications and additions, and it is the bill on which I now desire to bring the House to a vote. I want a record made on all the propositions now before us. Without consuming further time of the House I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Forty-five minutes.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I merely rise to state the case for the House. If I can find voice enough to do that I shall have accomplished as much as I expect.

The bill which is now the test, to which amendments are pending, is the same bill which received the assent of both Houses of Congress at the last session, with the following modifications to suit the tender susceptibilities of gentlemen from Massachusetts: first, the sixth section, declaring rebel officers not citizens of the United States, has been stricken out; second, the taxation clause has been stricken out; third, the word "government" has been inserted before "trial and punishment," to meet the refined criticisms of the two gentlemen from Massachusetts who suppose that penal laws would be in force and operative when the penalties were forbidden to be enforced; that discriminating laws could survive the declaration that there should be no discrimination between different persons in trial or punishment. There has been one section added to meet the present aspect of public affairs; that section authorizes the President, instead of pursuing the method prescribed in the bill in reference to the States where military resistance shall have been suppressed, in the event of the legislative authority under the rebellion in any rebel State taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, annulling their confiscation laws and ratifying the amendment proposed by this Congress to the Constitution of the United States, before military resistance shall be suppressed in such State, to recognize them as constituting the legal authority of the State, and directing him to report those facts to Congress for its assent and ratification. With these modifications, the bill which is now the test for amendment is the bill which was adopted by this House at the last session.

I shall not reflect upon the gentlemen of this House so far as to go into any argument to prove its authority to do what this bill proposes to do; its vote of the last session for this bill, word for word, is the sufficient proof of the right of the House to adopt it. It is only the House itself that can reverse that judgment and impeach its assertion of its own powers. Nor need I trouble myself to answer the arguments of the gentlemen who at the last session voted for this bill, and who, in the quiet and repose of the intervening period, have criticised in detail the language, and, not stopping there, have found in its substance that it essentially violates the principles of republican government and sanctions the enormities of the laws with which the existence of slavery has covered and defiled the statutes of every rebel State.
